Dawson, G. and Ross Smith, N., 2022. Why Putin's invasion of Ukraine had to happen. ECPR's Political Science Blog.

Deeb, M., 1980. The Lebanese Civil War. Praeger.

Demeshchuk, A., 2023. Russia Propaganda in Countries of Balkan Region: Pro-Kremlin Narratives in Local Online Media (Research Paper). spravdi.gov.ua.

DeRouen, K.R. and Peake, J., 2002. The Dynamics of Diversion: The Domestic Implications of Presidential Use of Force. International Interactions, 28:2.

Dunne, T., 2009. Liberalism, International Terrorism, and Democratic Wars. International Relations, 23:1.

Escribá-Folch, A. and Wright, J., 2015. Military Intervention and Regime Change. In Foreign Pressure and the Politics of Autocratic Survival. Oxford University Press.

Evans, G., Thakur, R. and Pape, R.A., 2013. Correspondence: Humanitarian Intervention and the Responsibility to Protect. International Security, 37:4.

Feste, K.A., 1992. Expanding the Frontiers: Superpower Interventions in the Cold War. Praeger.

Findley, M.G. and Teo, T.K., 2006. Rethinking Third-Party Interventions into Civil Wars: An Actor-Centric Approach. Journal of Politics, 68:4.

Fordham, B.O., 2008. Power or Plenty? Economic Interests, Security Concerns, and American Intervention. International Studies Quarterly, 52:4.

Gent, S.E., 2010. Scapegoating Strategically: Reselection, Strategic Interaction, and the Divisionary Theory of War. International Interactions, 35:1.

Gomez, S.E., 1997. The US Invasion of the Dominican Republic: 1965. Sincronía.

Herman, M., 2023. The Balkans, Russia, and Ukraine (part 1). Propaganda. Belsat.

Jackson, R., 2007. Regime Security. In Contemporary Security Studies. Oxford University Press.

Jentleson, B.W. and Levite, A.E., 1992. The Analysis of Protracted Foreign Military Intervention. In Foreign Military Intervention: The Dynamics of Protracted Conflict. Columbia University Press.

Jovanović, J., 2022. Russian Disinformation in the Western Balkans during the War in Ukraine. Oslo Center.

Kaplan, M.A., 1964. Intervention in Internal War: Some Systematic Sources. In International Aspects of Civil Strife. Princeton University Press.

Kavanagh, J., Frederick, B., Chandler, N., Charap, S., Heath, T.R., Tabatbai, A.M., Geist, E. and Curriden, C., 2017. Anticipating Adversary Military Interventions. RAND Corporation.

Koch, M.T. and Sullivan, P., 2010. Should I stay or Should I go Now? Partisanship, Approval, and the Duration of Major Power Democratic Military Interventions. Journal of Politics, 72:3.

Kocs, S.A., 1995. Territorial Disputes and Interstate War, 1945–1987. Journal of Politics, 57:1.

Lagon, M.P., 1992. The International System and the Reagan Doctrine: Can Realism Explain Aid to 'Freedom Fighters'? British Journal of Political Science, 22:1.

Lawson, F.H., 1984. Syria's Intervention in the Lebanese Civil War, 1976: A Domestic Conflict Explanation. International Organization, 38:3.

Massie, J. and Zyla, B., 2018. Alliance Value and Status Enhancement: Canada's Disproportionate Military Burden Sharing in Afghanistan. Politics and Polity, 46:2.

Meernik, J., 1994. Presidential Decision Making and the Political Use of Military Force. International Studies Quarterly, 38:1.

Modelski, G., 1964. The International Relations of Internal War. In International Aspects of Civil Strife. Princeton University Press.

Morgenthau, H.J. 1967. To Intervene or Not to Intervene. *Foreign Affairs, 36:*1.

Most, B.A. and Starr, H., 1989. Inquiry, Logic, and International Politics. University of South Carolina Press.
Ostrom, C.W. and Job, B.L., 1986. The President and the Political Use of Force. American Political Science Review, 80:2.
Peksen, D. and Lounsbery, M.O., 2012. Beyond the Target State: Foreign Military Intervention and Neighbouring State Stability. International Interactions, 38:3.
Pickering, J. and Kisangani, E.F., 2009. The International Military Intervention Dataset: An Updated Resource for Conflict Scholars. Journal of Peace Research, 46:4.
Rabinovich, I., 1979. The Limits of Military Power: Syria's Role. In Lebanon in Crisis: Participants and Issues. Syracuse University Press.
Rosenau, J.N., ed., 1964. International Aspects of Civil Strife. Princeton University Press.
Rost, N. and Greig, M.J., 2011. Taking Matters into Their Own Hands: An Analysis of the Determinants of State-Conducted Peacekeeping in Civil Wars. Journal of Peace Research, 48:2.
Sullivan, P.L. and Karreth, J. 2015. The conditional impact of military intervention on internal armed conflict outcomes. Conflict Management and Peace Science, 32:3.
Trenin, D., 2017. Demands on Russian Foreign Policy and Its Drivers: Looking Out Five Years. Carnegie Moscow Center.
Way, L.A., 2015. The Limits of Autocracy Promotion: The Case of Russia in the Near Abroad. European Journal of Political Research, 54:4.
Wolak, P.E., 2014. Foreign Military Interventions in Civil Conflicts, 1946–2002. University of Maryland.
Yoon, M.Y., 1997. Explaining U.S. Intervention in Third World Internal Wars, 1945–1989. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 41:4.
Young, O.R., 1968. Intervention and International Systems. Journal of International Affairs, 22:2.
Ziegler, C.E., 2016. Contesting the Responsibility to Protect. International Studies Perspectives, 17:1.

Foreign Policy & Autocratic Regimes

North Korea has taught a great lesson to all the countries in the world, especially the rogue countries of dictatorships (...) if you don't want to be invaded by America, get some nuclear weapons.
– Michael Moore

Foreign policy is an activity conducted by states outside their borders to achieve their national interest. This entry focuses on the study of foreign policy in autocratic states, which do not meet democratic standards in terms of "legitimation of rule, access, structure, claim and way of rule and the monopoly of rule" (Merkel 2010: 40-41, cited in Kneuer 2018: 97).

DEFINITION Hill (2016: 4) defines that foreign policy "is the sum of official external relations conducted by an independent actor (usually but not exclusively a state) in international relations." Autocratic regimes differ from their democratic counterparts. Because their decision-making is less dispersed, they are often the target of coercive foreign policy tools (like international sanctions or human rights shaming); due to authoritarian collaboration, they have different patterns of making alliances and institutionalizing such collaboration at the international levels (see authoritarian regionalism).

SEE ALSO Foreign policy relates to policymaking and the behavior of states. Analyzed as a process of decision-making, it is closely related to public policy analysis (of domestic policies); however, if analyzed as to its content, the substance of its goals and instruments is much closer to international politics. In terms of the latter, the related concepts are foreign policy capabilities, state power, and instruments of foreign policy: diplomacy, military, economic statecraft, and culture. While this Encyclopedia covers various aspects of a regime's performance and its behavior in International Relations, foreign policy-specific themes are covered in regime promotion (in particular authoritarian promotion and the behavior of black knights), authoritarian collaboration and authoritarian learning, and their institutionalized alliances, known as authoritarian regionalism.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE The study of foreign policy came to the fore after the behaviorist turn in American social sciences in the 1950s and 1960s (Carlsnaes 2006: 333). It forms part of the second major debate in the science of International Relations (IR), summarized as a divergence between 'behaviorist' (Foreign Policy Analysis – FPA) and 'systemic' analysis (IR), methodologically formulated by the problem of levels of analysis (Kubálková 2001b: 6). As defined by Singer (1961), the international system is the first level of analysis, which regards states as 'black boxes' or 'billiard balls' (Singer 1961: 81), whereas the state (in terms of being the origin of decisions) is the second level of analysis. Compared to IR, the main value added by FPA is its focus on the domestic policy process and why some decisions rather than others are taken in foreign policy. IR is more concerned with the consequences of these decisions for the international community as implemented via state behavior. Dictatorship is an element of so-called foreign policy inputs, deriving from a state's domestic environment. Neither FPA nor IR regularly deal with political regimes, as states are their main level of analysis. However, 'dictatorship' or 'autocracy,' as a type of rule, is classified under the 'government' domestic sub-level of analysis (Kinsella et al. 2013).

ORIGIN Not a lot of FPA has focused systematically on dictatorships as regime types. Only since the 1990s has FPA developed more theory-testing and been producing knowledge on autocratic foreign policy (Kneuer 2018). The initial inclusion of regime type into FPA was under the concept of 'closed' (as opposed to 'open') societies (Rosenau 1966); however, at the time, analysis showed that this domestic factor (next to political accountability and economic development) bore less influence than international factors (Rosenau & Hoggard 1974: 121-142, cited in Kneuer 2018: 101). While liberal theories have contributed to opening up the black box of states – e.g., liberalism, democratic peace theory, game theory, operational codes, national role conception, domestic structure approach, research on decision units – they have, in empirical terms, remained very democracy-biased or have focused on domestic politics and public opinion. Another reason for the underdevelopment of this area of study is either the choice of case studies (again, with a prevalence of Anglo-American and other Western cases) or the regional orientation of autocratic regime foreign policy studies (Kneuer 2018: 102). The influence and impact of the domestic political system on foreign policy remains one of the many questions in current FPA research programs (Hudson 2012: 31).

LITERATURE The literature has gravitated to two main topics regarding FPA in autocratic regimes. One collection of works focuses on the process of foreign policy formulation (A) and another looks at the level and nature of constraints on the foreign policy executive (B).

Foreign-policy making (A) In democratic regimes foreign policy formulation would be an open process, including market and civil society actors, such as business lobbies, chambers of commerce, research centers, think tanks and academia, and foreign lobbyists (states or companies). These domestic actors would work in a consultative capacity or with a political interest in parliamentary debates (specifically in parliamentary political systems), government and its ministries or the office of the State President (specifically in semi-presidential and presidential systems). The various forms of thus influencing foreign policy decisions are: direct influence on the executive branch in its formulation of initial FP choices (framing); influence on legislative procedure; influencing public opinion; direct actions (e.g., of NGOs on the ground), and corruption (Jentleson 2010: 53-55). In democratic regimes, these processes would be inclusive and regulated, whereas in dictatorships they would be closed (non-inclusive) to a small number of the political leadership (executive, political elite), e.g., the state president and their immediate advisers. In dictatorships, decision-makers' roles would be much more all-encompassing and not subject to legislative or independent judiciary checks-and-balances as in democracies. See also Box 6.5 on 'sycophants.'

Individuals in power might usurp state instruments to strengthen their image, for example to establish a personality cult via national and international propaganda, linking their person directly to the survival of the regime. These individuals, as state leaders, would be more active in and recognized through foreign policy implementation; however, this is not specific to dictatorships but also characteristic of presidential democratic systems. However, studies have shown that personalist and military regimes use military force overseas when domestic elite unrest increases. For example, Lisińska (2019) establishes that in the case of Argentine nationalist military dictatorship from 1976 to 1983, nationalism played a dominant role, which accounted for the need for the potential use of extraordinary measures (including the use of force), superseding pragmatic ways of implementing particular foreign policy goals.

Domestic constraints (B) A game-theoretical approach introduces two main constraints on leaders: the winning coalition and the selectorate. According to selectorate theory, the larger a leader's winning coalition, the more secure the leader's position is, and the more difficult it becomes for a regime to engage in war. Consequently, autocratic regimes, which typically have smaller inner circles, are more inclined to go to war. This is because they only need to provide private goods to a limited number of loyal backers (e.g., Bueno de Mesquita et at. 2003, cited in Kneuer 2018). See also Box 7.1 on 'audience costs' and Box 6.6 on 'veto players.'

In authoritarian regimes, domestic constraints on and supervisory mechanisms for foreign policymaking would not exist or perform well, since this domain is mainly in the hands of regime insiders, or, alternatively, can be vetoed by the public (mass uprising and elections) (Weeks & Crunkilton 2018). There are, however, differences among these regimes. In collegial authoritarian regimes, a leading political ideology produces stability and transparency, which, in turn, makes international cooperation easier and allow such regimes to "replicate many of the advantages of democracies" (Weeks & Crunkilton 2008: 422). Military regimes have more difficulty in gaining acceptance from the public and generating loyalty from the relevant regime supporters than personalist regimes. The latter – known for their low level of leadership constraints, pragmatic commitment to ideology and, notoriously, for their patronage networks – can manage society and elites (divide-and-rule) through personalist affective appeals and more coherent well-defined missions (Kneuer 2018) (see legitimacy). Non-democratic regimes stand out when it comes to foreign invasion and conflict & authoritarian regimes. This is formulated most prominently in the 'democratic peace theory' axiom, which states that democracies do not wage wars against each other. As for autocratic regimes, they are more peaceful towards one another than those in mixed dyads.

EXAMPLES & METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES Most of the examples of studies of autocratic regimes' foreign policies are of the Bolshevik and Communist Soviet Union, Italian Fascism, German National Socialism and China. A recent focus on 'role models of self-assertive international behavior' includes states such as China, Russia, Venezuela and Iran along with 'regions that show autocratic resilience,' namely the Middle East, Southeastern Asia and Africa (Kneuer 2018).

Still, the rift between FPA and IR, on the one hand, and comparative politics, on the other, is significant and not really narrowing, as the former fiercely guard their status as distinct fields. Progress has been slow, and it is mostly comparative authoritarianism that has made strides in accounting for international collaboration, learning, regionalism, and the importance of international networks for, e.g., regime promotion (Owen IV 2010; 2022) or patronage (Cooley & Heathershaw 2017).

State-centered bias From the IR perspective, few theoretical frames are primed to pry open the black box of the state or designed to look at regime types. Although there are some exceptions, like 'neoclassical realism' (NCR) (Ripsman et al. 2016), which integrate systemic pressures with domestic variables, such as the perceptions of decision-makers, state capacity, and internal political dynamics. Still, the frame is under-used for comparing the foreign policies of autocracies, and NCR has been criticized for not rising above the level of a mid-level theory and not respecting paradigmatic boundaries, as well as for its inability to offer a 'grand theory' (Meibauer et al. 2021).

Selection bias Comparative authoritarianism is making increasing inroads (see regime promotion) in the study of authoritarian diffusion in the international system, but theoretical frames on authoritarian collaboration and authoritarian learning are still being developed. IR studies are routinely Western-centric or biased towards great states and this hinders the field's ability to contribute to theories explaining autocratic behavior. For instance, even in applying NCR to the study of foreign policy, most works cover Western (democratic) states that are (more) transparent in their documentation regarding foreign policy formulation. There are very few case studies of non-democracies that are not great powers. (Some notable exceptions are Razani & Idris 2015; Juneau et al. 2019; Darwich 2022; Cerioli 2023 – which all cover MENA. Magcamit (2020) on the Philippines and McLean (2015) on Central Asia are other exceptions.)

Rationality bias FPA often assumes that state actors behave rationally, seeking to maximize their interests. However, in autocratic regimes, decision-making may be influenced by the unrestrained discretion of the leader in personalist regimes, (mis-) guided by a lack of credible information. Or it can be the result of patronage network trade-offs, and internal power struggles, which may not align with rational actor models and state affect performance (see coup-proofing). Chiozza and Goemans (2011), for instance, explain (some forms of) interstate conflict using domestic lenses.

Security bias In an anarchic world, states must look out for their own interests. Hence, their interactions are framed through distrust, competition, and conflict. Most IR and FPA theories give preference to the anarchic paradigm over domestic variables, e.g., when explaining the low levels of authoritarian regionalism or dyads of conflict & authoritarian regimes.

IMPACT ON POLICY Reiter and Stam (2002: 199) conclude that "democratic governments calculate very carefully whether their foreign policy actions are consistent with public opinion. Democratic leaders avoid starting wars that they will lose or that will be bloody, they choose military strategies that help them win cheap and successful wars, they fight short wars, and they start wars only for popular causes. In short, consent matters." As with any foreign policy decision, the use of appropriate instruments (diplomacy, economic measures, military, culture) to achieve a desired goal is more dispersed among decision-makers in democracies than in dictatorships. However, even though it sometimes appears that dictators very willingly use military power, research has shown that they use this power more for domestic purposes (to retain power) than for foreign policymaking.

Evidence shows that military regimes are more prone to conflict because they tend to emerge in more hostile international environments (Kim 2017, cited in Weeks and Crunkilton 2018: 419). In general, however, dictatorships do not engage in wars more easily than other regimes. Scholars have found that autocracies are more peaceful towards one another than are mixed dyads (democracy-autocracy) (Kneuer 2018: 105). Rather, it is the size of winning coalition that matters: large wining coalitions are less likely to get involved in war, but are more likely to participate in colonial and imperial wars and dedicate more resources to them (Bueno de Mesquita et al 2003). As for economic foreign policy tools, democracies trade more with democracies than autocracies, and democratic developing countries tend to be more open than dictatorships (Milner & Kubota 2005, cited in Weeks & Crunkilton 2018: 420). In terms of diplomacy, there is empirical evidence that dictatorships enter into international agreements less often and violate them more often than democracies do, yet this difference is almost entirely due to personalist regimes (Chyzh 2014, cited in Weeks & Crunkilton 2018: 422).

As regards their foreign policy behavior, it is less likely that autocratic regimes would develop a sense of mutual responsiveness and a similar collective identity than democracy proposing states. This means that they would cooperate with each other only out of narrowly defined self-interest, e.g., ALBA (Alianza Bolivariana para los Pueblos de Nuestra América) among Antigua and Barbuda, Bolivia, Cuba, Dominica, Grenada, Nicaragua, Saint Kitts and Nevis, Saint Lucia, Saint Vincent and the Grenadines, and led by Venezuela, which offers cheap oil deals in exchange for their collaboration. Yet autocratic regimes may strive to construct a 'regional regime identity' as an authoritarian gravity center (see Box 6.2) when great or regional powers actively engage in authoritarian promotion, influencing hybrid regimes or defective democracies as black knights (Kneuer 2018: 110), e.g., Russia in Eastern Europe, the Balkans and the Caucasus.

NEW FRONTIERS It seems that, in the case of dictatorships, government interest (staying in power) and state interest (achieving the national interest in the international community) (Alons 2007: 215) are much more aligned and even use the same instruments. Dictatorships are prone to misusing the state interest to pursue government interest. A well-researched example is 'regime-boosting regionalism,' which draws attention to "the discursive strategies of political elites in weak states who seek to strengthen a regime's official status, official sovereignty, image, and legitimacy – for example, rhetorical/symbolic regionalism where implementation of agreed policies is not the primary purpose" (Söderbaum 2013: 13). Recently, Debre (2021) has expanded this comparative research to different types of authoritarian regimes across regions (the cases of Zimbabwe, China and Bahrain) and revealed that membership in regional organizations provides additional material, informational and ideational resources to autocratic incumbents, which can be used to boost domestic survival strategies vis-à-vis internal and external challengers – thus linking these forms of international institutionalization to authoritarian learning.

How to cite:

Bojinović Fenko, Ana, 2025. Foreign Policy and Autocratic Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Alons, G.C., 2007. Predicting State's Foreign Policy: State Preferences between Domestic and International Constraints, 211-232. Foreign Policy Analysis, 3:3.

Bueno de Mesquita, B., Smith, A., Siverson, R.M. and Morrow, J.D., 2003. The logic of political survival (No. 19095). MIT.

Carlsnaes, W., 2006. Foreign Policy. In Handbook of International Relations. Sage.

Carlsnaes, W., Risse, T. and Simmons, B.A., eds., 2006. Handbook of International Relations. Sage.

Cerioli, L., 2023. Saudi Arabian strategy reassessment since 2003: The emergence of a regional leadership via Neoclassical Realist lenses. International Area Studies Review, 26:3.

Chiozza, G. and Goemans, H.E., 2011. Leaders and international conflict. Cambridge University Press.

Chyzh, O., 2014. Can you trust a dictator: A strategic model of authoritarian regimes' signing and compliance with international treaties. Conflict Management and Peace Science, 31:1.

Cooley, A.A. and Heathershaw, J., 2017. Dictators without borders: Power and money in Central Asia. Yale University Press.

Darwich, M., 2022. The view from Riyadh: A neoclassical realist perspective of Saudi foreign policy towards Iran in the post-2011 Middle East. In Saudi Arabia and Iran, Manchester University Press.

Debre, M.J., 2021. The dark side of regionalism: how regional organizations help authoritarian regimes to boost survival, 394–413. Democratization, 28:2.

Hill, C., 2016. Foreign policy in the twenty-first century. Palgrave Macmillan.

Hudson, V., 2012. The history and evolution of foreign policy analysis. In Foreign Policy: Theories, Actors, Cases (Second Edition). Oxford University Press.

Jentleson, W.B., 2010. American Foreign Policy: The Dynamics of Choice in the 21st Century (Fourth Edition). W.W. Norton & Company.

Juneau, T., Lobell, S.E., Ripsman, N.M. and Rubin, L.P., 2019. Neoclassical realism: Domestic politics, systemic pressures, and the impact on foreign policy since the Arab Spring. In Routledge Handbook of International Relations in the Middle East, Akbarzadeh, S., ed., Routledge.

Kim, N.K., 2017. Are Military Regimes Really Belligerent? Journal of Conflict Resolution, 62:6.

Kinsella, D.T., Russett, B.M. and Starr, H., 2013. World Politics: The menu for choice (Tenth Edition), Cengage Learning.

Kneuer, M., 2018. Autocratic regimes and foreign policy. In The Oxford Encyclopedia of Foreign Policy Analysis. Oxford University Press.

Kubálková, V., 2001. Foreign Policy in a Constructed World. M.E. Sharpe.

Lisińska, M., 2019. Argentine Foreign Policy during the Military Dictatorship, 1976–1983; Between a Nationalist and Pragmatic Approach. Palgrave Macmillan.

Magcamit, M., 2020. The Duterte method: A neoclassical realist guide to understanding a small power's foreign policy and strategic behaviour in the Asia-Pacific. Asian Journal of Comparative Politics, 5:4.

McLean, W., 2015. Authoritarianism, energy and ideas in Central Asia: from politics and pipelines to foreign policy. In Russia, Eurasia and the New Geopolitics of Energy: Confrontation and Consolidation, Palgrave Macmillan UK.

Meibauer, G., Desmaele, L., Onea, T., Kitchen, N., Foulon, M., Reichwein, A. and Sterling-Folker, J., 2021. Rethinking neoclassical realism at theory's end. International Studies Review, 23:1.

Merkel, W., 2010. Are dictatorships returning? Revisiting the 'democratic rollback' hypothesis. Contemporary Politics, 16:1.

Milner, H.V. and Kubota, K., 2005. Why the Move to Free Trade? Democracy and Trade Policy in the Developing Countries. International Organization, 59:1.

Owen IV, J.M., 2022. Ideology and Foreign Regime Promotion. In The Routledge Handbook of Ideology and International Relations, Routledge.

Owen, J.M., 2010. The Clash of Ideas in World Politics: Transnational Networks, States, and Regime Change, 1510-2010. Princeton University Press.

Razani, E. and Idris, N.A., 2015. The Shah's China Policy: From Hostility to Rapprochement (A Neoclassical Realist View). e-BANGI: Jurnal Sains Sosial dan Kemanusiaan, 1.

Reiter, D. and Stam, A., 2002. Democracies at War. Princeton University Press.

Ripsman, N.M., Taliaferro, J.W. and Lobell, S.E., 2016. Neoclassical realist theory of international politics. Oxford University Press.

Rosenau, J. N. and Hoggard, G., 1974. Foreign policy behavior in dyadic relationships: testing a pre-theoretical extension. In Comparing Foreign Policies: Theories, Findings, and Methods. John Wiley.

Rosenau, J.N., 1966. Pre-theories and Theories of Foreign Policy. In Approaches to Comparative and International Politics. Northwestern University Press.

Singer, J.D., 1961. The Level-of-Analysis Problem in International Relations. World Politics, 14:1.

Smith, S. Hadfield, A. and Dunne, T., eds., 2012. Foreign Policy; Theories, Actors, Cases (Second Edition). Oxford University Press.

Söderbaum, F., 2013. Rethinking Regions and Regionalism. Georgetown Journal of International Affairs, 14:2.

Weeks, J.L.P. and Crunkilton, C., 2018. Domestic Constraints on Foreign Policy in Authoritarian Systems. In The Oxford Encyclopedia of Foreign Policy Analysis. Oxford University Press.

Box 6.5 Sycophancy: The Subtle Art of Bootlicking

SYCOPHANT, n. One who approaches Greatness on his belly so that he may not be commanded to turn and be kicked. He is sometimes an editor.
– Ambrose Bierce, The Devil's Dictionary (1911)

It is a question not of dishonesty but of prudence.
– Alphons Silbermann, Grovelling and Other Vices: The Sociology of Sycophancy (2000)

Sycophancy in authoritarian regimes is a phenomenon deeply intertwined with the loyalty-competence trade-off, a dynamic central to the functioning and survival of such systems. While scholars have extensively analyzed why rulers prioritize loyalty over competence – often citing the need for personal security and regime stability – the motivations and payoffs for elites who embrace sycophantic behavior remain less understood. Why do some elites choose to engage in sycophancy while others abstain? What are the precise advantages they derive, and how do these vary across different types of authoritarian regimes? These questions remain at the forefront of ongoing research.

For dictators, sycophancy comes with significant costs, particularly in terms of information gathering. Surrounded by 'yes men,' authoritarian leaders often lose access to reliable data, honest opinions, and justified warnings against flawed policies. However, for elites lower in the pecking order, sycophancy can serve as a survival strategy within the regime, even as it contributes to the emergence of personality cults.

The formation of personality cults follows a path-dependent logic. Initially driven by individual opportunism among elites ('immoral innovators'), these cults gain momentum as others emulate such behavior out of fear or ambition (Popan 2015). Over time, public displays of loyalty become mandatory rather than voluntary acts – failure to participate risks punishment or exclusion from power structures.

This is a two-way street: Such cults demand humiliating displays of loyalty through ritualistic performances, which not only intimidate but also divide elites. These performances erode trust among elite insiders as they witness their peers' willingness to grovel and spin lies to those in power. This mistrust undermines collaboration and complicates efforts to organize opposition against the dictator from within.

These divisive patterns raise the organizational costs of elite opposition and are closely linked to broader practices of denunciation (Box 3.11) within authoritarian systems. They also resonate with scholarship on surveillance and control mechanisms in such regimes. As a result, sycophancy has become a topic of renewed interest in the field of comparative authoritarianism, offering insights into how loyalty rituals shape elite behavior, regime stability, and the broader dynamics of power under autocracy. (The limited space for 'meritocracy' under dictatorship is researched as well, cf. Box 1.9.).

Sycophantic behavior among elites often stems from their precarious position within authoritarian systems. In such regimes, power asymmetries between rulers and subordinates create an environment where elites are constantly at risk of demotion, purges, or arbitrary punishment. For weaker elites – those with limited resources, poor networks, or fewer alternative career options – sycophancy becomes a rational strategy to signal loyalty and secure their position within the regime's hierarchy (Baturo et al. 2024). By publicly professing exaggerated devotion to the dictator through speeches or symbolic acts, these elites aim to reduce their vulnerability while increasing their chances of receiving rewards such as promotions or protection from purges.

The dynamics of sycophancy are particularly evident in personalist regimes where power is highly centralized around an individual leader. In such contexts, weaker elites have strong incentives to 'play the sycophant card,' as their dependence on the ruler for political survival is more pronounced than in other forms of authoritarianism (Baturo et al. 2024). In an example from Russia, subnational leaders operating in resource-poor regions often rely heavily on central government subsidies to maintain local support. This economic dependency compels them to engage in more ostentatious displays of loyalty compared to their counterparts in wealthier regions with greater autonomy.

However, not all elites engage in sycophantic behavior to the same extent. Stronger elites – those with independent sources of power or alternative career paths – are less likely to resort to obsequiousness. For them, excessive displays of loyalty can be politically costly, as they risk damaging their reputation as independent actors or foreclosing opportunities to join alternative coalitions should the dictator's grip on power weaken (Chung-Hon Shih 2008). Thus, while sycophancy is a common strategy among weaker elites, its prevalence varies depending on structural conditions such as resource distribution and individual elite characteristics.

From the perspective of authoritarian rulers, sycophancy presents both benefits and risks. On one hand, public displays of loyalty reinforce the image of the dictator as dominant and unchallengeable. They help create an atmosphere where dissent becomes costly for both elites and ordinary citizens (Huang 2015). By rewarding sycophants with promotions or other forms of recognition, dictators can incentivize similar behavior among other members of the ruling coalition, thereby consolidating their control over the regime.

On the other hand, sycophancy undermines effective governance by distorting information flows. When officials prioritize flattery over competence or truth-telling, rulers are deprived of accurate assessments needed for sound decision-making (Peceny & Butler 2004). This phenomenon has been observed in several historical cases where dictators surrounded by 'yes men' made disastrous policy decisions based on flawed intelligence or overly optimistic reports. For instance, scholars have pointed to Vladimir Putin's invasion of Ukraine in 2022 as an example where sycophantic advisers likely overstated Russia's military capabilities while underestimating Ukrainian resistance (Gomza 2022).

Moreover, rewarding sycophants over competent officials exacerbates what scholars term the 'loyalty-competence trade-off' (Egorov & Sonin, 2011). While loyalists may be less likely to challenge the dictator's authority, they are often less capable of managing state functions effectively. Over time, this trade-off can erode institutional capacity and increase regime fragility.

While personality cults may bolster short-term regime stability by projecting an image of unity and strength, they come at significant long-term costs. They deepen mistrust among elites by encouraging denunciation and competition rather than collaboration (Baturo et al. 2024). Additionally, such social systems entrench a culture of insincerity (like the Soviet tukhta (тухта, sometimes tufta) system of cheating labor quotas in Soviet labor camps) that permeates all levels of society and governance (Welsh 2024; Popan 2015). This culture not only stifles dissent but also undermines genuine problem-solving and innovation within state institutions.

Despite growing interest in sycophancy as a subject of study within comparative authoritarianism, many questions remain unanswered. First, while existing research highlights variations in sycophantic behavior across individual elites and regime types, more work is needed to understand how these dynamics evolve during periods of political transition or crisis. Do weaker elites abandon sycophantic strategies when dictators are believed to lose power? How do stronger elites navigate shifts in regime stability?

Second, there is a limited understanding of how psychological factors influence both rulers' receptiveness to flattery and elites' willingness to engage in it. For instance, does prolonged exposure to sycophantic praise alter dictators' perceptions of reality? Similarly, what motivates some individuals within elite circles to resist engaging in obsequious behavior despite systemic pressures?

Finally, comparative studies across different historical and cultural contexts could provide valuable insights into why some regimes develop pervasive personality cults and widespread sycophancy while others do not. Interesting are also dictators' strategies to overcome this information deficit by developing compensating strategies (co-optation of opposition groups, advanced forms of surveillance, etc.).

Sycophancy is a multifaceted phenomenon that shapes both elite behavior and regime dynamics under authoritarianism. While it offers short-term benefits for both rulers and subordinates – reinforcing loyalty signals and securing political survival – it also introduces significant risks by distorting information flows and undermining institutional capacity.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Sycophancy: The Subtle Art of Bootlicking, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Egorov, G. and Sonin, K., 2011. Dictators and their viziers: Endogenizing the loyalty-competence trade-off. Journal of the European Economic Association, 9:5.

Huang, H., 2015. Propaganda as Signaling. Comparative Politics, 47:4.

Baturo, A., Khokhlov, N. and Tolstrup, J., 2024. Playing the sycophant card: The logic and consequences of professing loyalty to the autocrat. American Journal of Political Science.

Gomza, I., 2022. The War in Ukraine: Putin's Inevitable Invasion. Journal of Democracy, 33:3.

Popan, A.T., 2015. The ABC of sycophancy: Structural conditions for the emergence of dictators' cults of personality. Doctoral dissertation, The University of Texas at Austin.

Welsh, J., 2024. Tukhta: labour and resistance in the audit regime of the Soviet Gulag. Labor History, 65:1

Peceny, M. and Butler, C.K., 2004. The conflict behavior of authoritarian regimes. International Politics, 41.

Chung-Hon Shih, V., 2008. "Nauseating" displays of loyalty: Monitoring the factional bargain through ideological campaigns in China. The Journal of Politics, 70:4.

Box 6.6 Veto Players – Obstructing Change

One who has in his power to prevent a change from the status quo.
– George Tsebelis (2002)

Veto player theory draws from rational choice theory, which argues that rather than looking at the institutional structure, researchers should investigate the powerful players in a particular setting to understand outcomes. Veto players are "individuals or collective actors whose agreement is necessary for a policy decision" (Tsebelis 1995: 295). In veto player theory, it is important to identify the number of veto players and their identity in any given system or who is involved in the political game.

Veto player theory, originally developed for democratic systems, can thus be collective or individual actors (whose agreement is necessary to alter the status quo). Moreover, they can be categorized as either institutional (established by constitutional or legal frameworks) or partisan (emerging from political dynamics, such as coalition partners). The addition of a veto player can affect the policy-making process in two key ways. First, it may reduce the size of the 'winset' of the status quo – the set of policy alternatives that can defeat the current state – depending on whether the new veto player is independent or absorbed by an existing one. Second, it may expand the unanimity core – the set of policies that cannot be defeated by unanimous consent among veto players – if the new actor introduces greater ideological diversity. (Tsebelis 2002)

Spreading veto players further apart ideologically reduces the winset's size and enlarges the unanimity core, leading to greater policy stability. A smaller winset and a larger unanimity core are essentially equivalent in their effect: they make policy changes more difficult and enhance stability. The 'agenda setter' – a veto player with the power to propose take-it-or-leave-it offers – enjoys significant strategic advantages. However, this advantage diminishes as policy stability increases or when the agenda setter's ideological position aligns more closely with other veto players, facilitating consensus. (Tsebelis 2002)

Veto players are sometimes constitutionally recognized, such as the Supreme Court in the United States (an institutional, collective veto player). However, they can be de facto decision-makers, such as the siloviki in Russia, at least before 2022. The siloviki are comprised of the elites that prop up Putin in power and work for the 'ministries of force' (literally) (Illarionov 2009). Currently – instrumentalizing the invasion of Ukraine to this purpose – Vladimir V. Putin has acquired higher levels of personalist power, and siloviki is no longer able to counter his policies (Waller 2024). The term силовик (silovik) refers to an agent of one of the security organizations. It is a collective noun for all troops and officers of such institutions. As veto players, only the top officials in charge of the various branches of the armed forces, law enforcement and intelligence services are considered.

In the world of authoritarian regimes, there is a wide range of veto players both in quantity and power. The more veto players that exist, the more the system has to take these views into account and find compromises. This can lead to the perception that the policy-making environment is contentious. As such, some authors argue that in authoritarian settings, regimes with more veto players will respond to this contentious environment by becoming more intolerant and repressive (Singh & Dunn 2013).

Other work on authoritarian regimes and veto players has applied this theory to different types of dictatorships to make predictions about the outcomes. Single-party regimes in which a party with a large group of political elites is in charge would have the most veto players, followed by monarchies with large ruling families, followed by military juntas, with personalist rule having the smallest number of veto players.

Because single-party regimes have so many veto players, this has numerous implications. The first is that policy output is slow, steady and stable. In the case of China, for example (or at least prior to the personalist rise of Xi Jinping), the large number of political elites involved in decision-making and a part of different factions meant that the decisions were not made overnight (Frantz 2003). Instead, decisions on policy required careful consideration and political elites debated and put forward their views (Frantz & Ezrow 2011). The number of veto players has other implications for conflict. In personalist rule, due to the lack of veto players, decisions are often made in isolation or with little consultation. As a result, personalist regimes are more likely to engage in risky conflict behavior (Peceny & Butler 2004), as when Saddam Hussein decided to invade Kuwait. Saddam formally controlled all political hierarchies in the state, the Ba'ath Party and the military in Iraq. The ministers of defense exercised no independent authority. Saddam's cousin, Ali Hasan Al Majid (Chemical Ali), claimed that there was no instance when anyone brought bad news to Saddam or contradicted him (Hosner 2007) – see also 'sycophancy' in Box 6.5.

Veto player theory helps us understand better different outcomes in authoritarian regimes, underscoring how authoritarian regimes differ considerably. Like with 'audience costs' (Box 7.1) and selectorate theory, they are one of many ways to break open the black box of dictatorships.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha and Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Veto Players – Obstructing Change, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Frantz, E., 2003. Breaking down the residual category: Policy stability among dictatorships from a veto players perspective.

Frantz, E. and Ezrow, N., 2011. The Politics of Dictatorship: Institutions and Outcomes. Lynn Rienner.

Hosmer, S.T., 2007. Why the Iraqi resistance to the coalition invasion was so weak. Rand Corporation.

Illarionov, A., 2009. Reading Russia: The siloviki in charge. Journal of Democracy, 20:2.

Peceny, M. and Butler, C.K., 2004. The conflict behavior of authoritarian regimes. International Politics, 41.

Singh, S.P. and Dunn, K.P., 2013. Veto players, the policy-making environment and the expression of authoritarian attitudes. Political Studies, 61:1.

Tsebelis, G., 1995. Decision making in political systems: Veto players in presidentialism, parliamentarism, multi-cameralism and multipartyism. British Journal of Political Science, 25:3.

Tsebelis, G., 2002. Veto Players: How Political Institutions Work. Princeton University Press.

Waller, J.G., 2024. Putin the Resilient: Predicting the Collapse of His Regime Is Wishful Thinking. Foreign Affairs.

International Sanctions & Autocratic Regimes

Sanctions are a sign of irritation, they are not the instrument of serious policies – Sergei V. Lavrov, Foreign Minister of Russia, 2014

Laws are like cobwebs, which may catch small flies, but let wasps and hornets break through – Jonathan Swift (1667-1745)

Sanctions are a retributive, reactionary foreign policy instrument aimed at changing governments' behavior. They are more likely to be effective when applied by a large group of countries and when targeting regimes that are constrained by domestic institutions.

DEFINITION International sanctions are a specific method of external intervention based on coercive (restrictive) measures undertaken by one country, a coalition of countries or an international organization against another country (the government, any group or individuals within the country) with the aim of changing the targeted country's behavior or a specific policy (Escribà-Folch 2010; Keukelaire & Delreux 2014). This can be done by using different foreign policy tools or instruments, whether diplomatic, political, economic, financial or cultural (Smith 2014). Among the main motivations for the imposition of sanctions are violent conflicts, human rights violations, a lack of democratic principles, and threats to security or political violence (Ilieva et al. 2018; Smith 2014).

SEE ALSO Sanctions are, of course, a form of foreign policy. On their own, these are usually not sufficient for democracy promotion, but can serve as one of several factors aimed at regime promotion. Dictatorships also resort to them, but often in a retaliatory fashion, or for geopolitical reasons. Since they usually lack an effective alliance (see authoritarian regionalism) to execute sanctions effectively, there is only sporadic evidence that they are used for the specific goal of authoritarian promotion (although great autocratic powers like Russia or China – see Box 6.2 on 'authoritarian gravity centers' – do have such leverage on weaker neighbors).

KEY SIGNIFICANCE With regard to their application, sanctions can be either unilateral (imposed by one state) or multilateral (imposed by a coalition of countries or an international organization). They can be imposed in response to perceived violations of international rules (e.g., after a violent conflict has erupted, human rights violations, etc.) or pre-emptively (e.g., before the escalation of conflict, political violence or potential breaches of human rights) (Smith 2014). With regard to the target entity, sanctions are either 'comprehensive,' i.e. applied against a country and including a wide range of measures, or 'targeted' (also 'smart'), because they focus only on those responsible for the state's behavior and, as such, are intended to cause minimal hardship to the whole population (Drezner 2011: 96; Caetano et al. 2023). Comprehensive sanctions envisage an interruption of relations with the third country as a whole, including measures such as suspending or reducing diplomatic relations and cooperation, trade or arms embargoes, boycotting sports or cultural events, imposing flight bans, etc. One example of such comprehensive sanctions was the EU sanctions regime against Syria, which included an arms embargo, a ban on the import of oil from Syria, on aid and investment, and trade restrictions (Smith 2014: 167). Targeted measures, on the other hand, address specific individuals (often political leaders or elites), non-state entities (such as terrorist groups or companies) or products (such as diamonds, ivory or timber) and usually take the form of financial sanctions (freezing of funds) or travel bans against these specific entities (Keukelaire & Delreux 2014).

LITERATURE As a consequence of the increasing importance of multilateralism in international relations, sanctions have been extensively researched by scholars. Most studies have focused on the effectiveness of sanctions by states and international organizations. Among the most cited works are Hufbauer et al. (1985; 2009) on the effectiveness of international sanctions, covering more than a hundred case studies, and Biersteker et al. (2013) on UN targeted sanctions. Also noteworthy is the contribution by Martin and Simmons (2012) on the institutionalization of international sanctions as a prerequisite for their implementation and, more recently, on the examination of the design of sanctions (see Bapat et al. 2020; Meissner 2023).

Nossal (1999: 147) posited that democracies are most vulnerable to economic sanctions, due to their number of veto players (see Box 6.6), the existence of domestic opposition and prevailing practices that allow opposition to be expressed, channeled and perhaps directed against the ruling coalition. Escribà-Folch and Wright (2010) were among the first to distinguish how sanctions destabilize autocrats, differentiating between regime types (see also Box 7.1 on 'audience costs'). They find that personalist rule and monarchies, which rely heavily on aid and resource rents, are more vulnerable to sanctions, often leading to irregular changes like coups. In contrast, single-party and military regimes can maintain or even increase their tax revenues and reallocate expenditures to sustain their patronage networks, making sanctions against them largely ineffective. The latter regimes can also rely on their ability to employ repressive tactics and positive inducements to maintain support (Peksen 2019a). Major (2012) brings to attention the timing of sanctions, which are more effective when they overlap with domestic instability.

Cho (2019) looks at the impact of (US) economic sanctions on social welfare spending in authoritarian countries and different patterns of budget cuts. Multi-party regimes tend to cut social spending (education and health) to a lesser degree (than their 'closed' counterparts), since they are wary of societal threats as a result of economic hardship. Oechslin (2014) finds that if autocratic targets react to sanctions by lowering the supply of public goods, they indirectly deprive potential challengers of resources (thus maximizing the nation's suffering rather than relieving it, while making the sanctions ineffective).

Looking at the other side, von Soest and Wahman (2015) find that Western senders are more likely to impose sanctions following dramatic events like coups, where international pressure is high, indicating a response to civil liberties violations rather than purely Realpolitik interests. Sanctions are more also likely after less dramatic events, such as controversial elections, especially if domestic costs are low. Sanctions are more common in unstable regimes with mobilized citizens and weak economies. However, senders balance democratic aims with national interests, considering economic and political costs. Stable repressive regimes with high GDP are somewhat less targeted, yet even less targeted are recipients of high FDI by Western donors.

CLASSIFICATION According to the foreign policy tools used to bring about policy or institutional changes in target countries, sanctions can be divided into the following types. Diplomatic sanctions usually mean the "cessation of formal diplomatic contact" or the non-recognition of a regime (Maller 2010: 62), but also the withdrawing or expelling of diplomatic or military personnel, the suspending of high-level contacts and the imposition of visa/travel bans on particular individuals from targeted countries (Smith 2014: 56). This type of sanctions is also referred to as political sanctions (Escribà-Folch & Wright 2010), and is often combined with other types of sanctions. Economic sanctions are the most commonly used instrument in international relations (Peksen 2019b; Ilieva et al. 2018; Escribà-Folch 2010). They specifically aim to intentionally cause economic damage to the targeted country, and include suspension or reduction of aid, an embargo or boycott on trade in specific goods, freezing foreign assets, an increase in tax, the suspension of trade agreements, etc. (Smith 2014: 53). Another type of sanctions is military sanctions. They are regarded as preventive measures to avoid the use of weapons by targeting the trade or transfer of military technology, equipment and weapons to the targeted country (Ilieva et al. 2018). The specific measures include arms embargoes, restrictions on technology transfer, dual-use technology and military training and cooperation. Lastly, cultural sanctions aim to exert pressure on a targeted country by imposing restrictions on cultural or sports exchanges and interactions. Examples include non-participation in cultural and sporting events (boycotting), suspending cultural, academic and educational exchanges, or restrictions on the distribution of film and media from the targeted country (Ilieva et al. 2018).

MEASUREMENT Although sanctions are one of the most widely used mechanisms to exert international pressure, their utility is constantly debated. As studies reveal, there is great disagreement as to the extent of their success rate (Hufbauer et al. 2009; Biersteker et al. 2013), the type of sanctions that are more effective (Kaempfer & Lowenberg 1999; Drezner 2011; Pala 2021) and the conditions under which sanctions are expected to work (Escribà-Folch 2010; Meissner 2023). Recent empirical studies of imposed international sanctions show that they are effective against democracies, but less likely to succeed against non-democracies (Marinov 2005; Caetano et al. 2023). However, according to Escribà-Folch and Wright (2010: 336), the effect of sanctions in non-democratic regimes is further conditioned by the type of authoritarian rule in the target country, with personalist rulers and autocratic monarchies being more susceptible to sanctions than single-party and military regimes.

METHODOLOGY There is still much work to be done on this important topic within the field of comparative authoritarianism. While variation within (the broad category of) authoritarian regimes is significant, we know that their level of institutionalization, their organizational nexus, as well as the context and timing of sanctions, matter (von Soest 2024). The mechanics of regime resilience remain under-explored (e.g., the effects of ideology, legitimacy, authoritarian legacies, etc.). This is also the case with the exact workings of pressure points, both within the regime, like 'audience costs' (Box 7.1) and 'veto players' (Box 6.6), and externally, in terms of their interconnectedness within the international system (see linkage & leverage theory), as well as of the capacity of regimes to modify their international contexts (gatekeeping).

Longitudinal bias Many studies rely on cross-sectional data, which can miss the long-term effects of sanctions. Longitudinal studies are needed to understand how sanctions impact authoritarian regimes over time, but such studies are less common due to the resource requirements and complexity involved. In addition, over time, recurring sanction regimes can facilitate the emergence of new international norms that are able to constrain or modify regime behavior.

Endogeneity bias The decision to impose sanctions is not random (von Soest & Wahman 2015); it is influenced by the behavior of the target regime and the strategic interests of the sanctioning countries. This makes it challenging to disentangle the effects of sanctions from other factors that might influence the stability and behavior of authoritarian regimes.

Benchmarking There are substantial difficulties in measuring both the independent variable (sanctions) and the dependent variable (regime stability or change). Sanctions vary widely in their scope, duration, and enforcement, making it hard to create a standardized measure. Similarly, regime stability can be influenced by numerous internal and external factors, complicating the attribution of changes directly to sanctions. In addition, Van Bergeijk and Siddiquee (2017) analyze the effect of scholars' over-reliance on the Database on International Economic Sanctions of the Peterson Institute for International Economics, notwithstanding the latter's openly stating that it sometimes under-reports sanctions between powers of the second and third rank, sanctions without English documentation, and sanctions imposed in comparative secrecy.

Economic bias Much of the literature focuses predominantly on economic sanctions, often neglecting other forms of pressure such as diplomatic isolation, travel bans, and arms embargoes. This narrow focus can lead to an incomplete understanding of how different types of sanctions interact and how they affect authoritarian regimes, especially since sanctions are seldom used in isolation, and are accompanied by other forms of pressure (von Soest 2024: 310).

IMPACT ON POLICY Skepticism as to whether and how sanctions can be used to affect the stability of authoritarian regimes and lead to change in their behavior depends on the following conditions. Firstly, the legality and legitimacy of sanctions. Sanctions are considered legal if they are in response to violations of international law (Brzoska 2015). However, the compliance of sanctions with international law is often disputed because it clashes with the principles of sovereignty and non-intervention or because the use of restrictive measures is seen as disproportionate vis-à-vis the objectives (Ilieva et al. 2018). As such, the 'responsibility to protect' argument used to bypass the non-intervention principle is increasingly criticized by authoritarian regimes "as a tool of Western great power management" (Wilson & Yao 2019), contending that sanctions are not adopted with the aim of affecting change but in the context of the intervening actors' broader geostrategic considerations. In cases where there are mixed motives, it is unlikely that sanctions will be either effective or legitimate.

Authoritarian leaders, in particular, might question the legitimacy of international sanctions and use them to mobilize support against the sanctioning states by portraying them as 'external aggressors' (Pala 2021: 249). In turn, this 'rally-around-the-flag' effect can further strengthen the position and hold on power of authoritarian leaders (Schmitz & Sikkink 2010: 530). A certain group of authoritarian regimes – Belarus, Cuba, Eritrea, North Korea, and Zimbabwe – has persistently resisted the destabilizing effects of sanctions. In these nations, strong claims to legitimacy, combined with other factors, have significantly contributed to the failure of sanctions in undermining authoritarian rule. When regimes possess robust legitimation strategies, sanctions often end up reinforcing their stability. These regimes find it easier to incorporate sanctions into their narratives of legitimacy, especially when their ties to the sanctioning entities are weak (see linkage & leverage theory). This weak connection limits the sanctioning countries' ability to convey the true objectives of the sanctions. Consequently, distant sanctioning nations are often depicted as adversaries, and their sanctions framed as unjust imperialist violations of the targeted country's sovereignty (Grauvogel & von Soest 2014).

Secondly, international sanctions can lead to unintended consequences. Although sanctions imposed against a country target the government and its economic, financial and political elites, they can cause (more) harm to the wider population via the 'spill-over effect' (Ahn & Ludema 2020). Studies show that the response to sanctions by the target state tends to exacerbate negative side effects, such as decreasing the living conditions of the civilian population (Ilieva et al. 2018), and increasing co-optation (popular support) and repression on the part of the authoritarian regime (Escribà-Folch & Wright 2010: 344). As a consequence of increased international pressure and isolation, sanctions can foster illegal transactions, smuggling and cause trade losses for neighboring countries (Smith 2014; Caetano et al. 2023). Sanctions can also lead to an increase in technological and military development in the target country, as was the case with the international sanctions imposed on Russia after 2014 (Pala 2021: 251).

Thirdly, there can be inconsistency in the application of sanctions. When taking decisions on sanctions, sanctioning countries face a trade-off between imposing damage and high costs on the target country, and protecting their domestic (mostly business) interest groups from the costs arising from sanctions. As a result, sanctions are less likely against important trade partners (Weber 2019), particularly against oil-producing countries, because "the demand for oil is highly inelastic in most sanction-sending countries, making them more reluctant to disrupt energy supplies" (Escribà-Folch & Wright 2010: 355). Domestic groups in sanctioning countries often oppose sanctions altogether or lobby for their removal or downsizing, and this is known as the 'black knight-effect' (black knights) (Caetano et al. 2023: 3). Another inconsistency is linked to the implementation of imposed sanctions. Martin and Simmons (2012: 336) show that implementation requires a certain level of cooperation between states and a binding power if sanctions are to be effective. However, although multilateral sanctions are considered more effective and legitimate than unilateral ones (Pala 2021), they are not always mandatory and lack enforcement mechanisms, which limits the likelihood of destabilizing authoritarian regimes.

Lastly, there is the rising importance of geopolitical considerations in deciding against which target countries sanction should be imposed. Drezner (1999) shows that sanctions are usually designed in such a way that rival actors (Russia in the post-2022 context) are preferred to strategically important states (such as China or Saudi Arabia). States can block the use of negative restrictive measures if they harm their commercial and political interests or if a third country is too strategically important to be antagonized. The result is often the lowest common denominator, which decreases the costs for target countries or imposes no sanctions at all (Smith 2014: 119). According to Pala (2021), one of the most important systemic problems with imposing sanctions is the existence of third countries that counter or do not support sanctions (black knights). This allows target countries to evade the damage caused by sanctions and makes sanctions ineffective (Caetano et al. 2023). The most prominent recent examples of this include China's fundamental support for North Korea, the Russian opposition to international sanctions against the Syrian regime, and India and China's importation of Russian energy products.

How to cite:

Požgan, Jure, 2025. International Sanctions and Autocratic Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ahn, D.P. and Ludema, D.R., 2020. The sword and the shield: The economics of targeted sanctions. European Economic Review, 130:C.

Bapat, N.A., Early, B.R., Grauvogel, J. and Kleinberg, K., 2020. The design and enforcement of economic sanctions. International Studies Perspectives, 21.

Biersteker, T.J., Eckert, S.E., Tourinho, M. and Hudakova, Z., 2013. Effectiveness of UN targeted sanctions: findings from the Targeted Sanctions Consortium (TSC). The Graduate Institute.

Brzoska, M., 2015. International sanctions before and beyond UN sanctions. International affairs, 91:6.

Caetano, J., Galego, A. and Caleiro, A., 2023. On the Determinants of Sanctions Effectiveness: An Empirical Analysis by Using Duration Models. Economies, 11:5.

Cho, W., 2019. Making dictators' pockets empty: How do US sanctions influence social policies in autocratic countries? Defence and Peace Economics, 30:6.

Drezner, D.W. 2011. Sanctions sometimes smart: Targeted sanctions in theory and practice, International Studies Review, 13:1.

Escribà-Folch, A., 2010. Economic sanctions and the duration of civil conflicts. Journal of Peace Research, 47:2.

Escribà-Folch, A. and Wright, J., 2010. Dealing with Tyranny: International Sanctions and the Survival of Authoritarian Rulers. International Studies Quarterly, 54:2.

Grauvogel, J. and von Soest, C., 2014. Claims to legitimacy count: Why sanctions fail to instigate democratisation in authoritarian regimes. European Journal of Political Research, 53:4.

Hufbauer, G.C., Schott, J.J. and Elliott, K.A., 1985. Economic Sanctions Reconsidered. Peterson Institute for International Economics.

Hufbauer, G.C., Schott, J.J., Elliott, K.A. and Oegg, B., 2009. Economic Sanctions Reconsidered. Peterson Institute for International Economics.

Ilieva, J., Dashtevski, A. and Kokotovic, F., 2018. Economic sanctions in International Law. UTMS Journal of Economics, 9:2.

Kaempfer, W.H. and Lowenberg, A.D., 1999. Unilateral Versus Multilateral International Sanctions: A Public Choice Perspective. International Studies Quarterly, 43:1.

Keukelaire, S. and Delreux, T., 2014. The Foreign Policy of the European Union, (second edition), Palgrave Macmillan.

Major, S., 2012. Timing is everything: Economic sanctions, regime type, and domestic instability. International Interactions, 38:1.

Maller, T., 2010. Diplomacy Derailed: The Consequences of Diplomatic Sanctions. The Washington Quarterly, 33:3.

Marinov, N., 2005. Do Economic Sanctions Destabilize Country Leaders? American Journal of Political Science, 49:3.

Martin, L.L. and Simmons, B.A., 2012. International Organisations and Institutions. In Handbook of International Relations. Sage.

Meissner, K., 2023. How to sanction international wrongdoing? The design of EU restrictive measures. The Review of International Organizations, 18.

Nossal, K.R., 1999. Liberal democratic regimes, international sanctions, and global governance. Globalization and global governance.

Oechslin, M., 2014. Targeting autocrats: Economic sanctions and regime change. European Journal of Political Economy, 36.

Pala, T., 2021. The Effectiveness of Economic Sanctions: A Literature Review. The NISPACEE Journal of Public Administration and Policy, 14:1.

Peksen, D., 2019a. Autocracies and economic sanctions: The divergent impact of authoritarian regime type on sanctions success. Defence and Peace Economics, 30:3.

Peksen, D., 2019b. When Do Imposed Economic Sanctions Work? A Critical Review of the Sanctions Effectiveness Literature. Defence and Peace Economics, 30:6.

Schmitz, H.P. and Sikkink, K., 2010. International Human Rights. In Handbook of International Relations. Sage.

Smith, K., 2014. European Union Foreign Policy in a Changing World (Third Edition). Polity Press.

Van Bergeijk, P.A. and Siddiquee, M.S., 2017. Biased sanctions? Methodological change in economic sanctions reconsidered and its implications. International Interactions, 43:5.

von Soest, C. and Wahman, M., 2015. Not all dictators are equal: Coups, fraudulent elections, and the selective targeting of democratic sanctions. Journal of Peace Research, 52:1.

von Soest, C., 2024. Pressure proofing: how authoritarian regimes respond to sanctions. In Research Handbook on Authoritarianism, Lindstaedt N. and Van den Bosch, J.J.J., eds., Edward Elgar Publishing.

Weber, P., 2019. The Imposition and Effectiveness of Sanctions: "It's the Economy, Stupid!" Doctoral Dissertation. University of Konstanz.

Wilson, P. and Yao, J., 2019. International Organization in the Anarchical Society. In International Organization in the Anarchical Society. Palgrave.

Islamic States

Islam, the government and the people are like the tent, the pole, the ropes and the pegs. The tent is Islam; the pole is the government; the ropes and pegs are the people. None will do without the others.
– Ibn Qutaybah

Islamic states are foremost de-colonial projects aimed at saving the Muslim Ummah from Western domination, both rejecting Western modernity (especially secularism) and borrowing aspects from it (like the nation-state, territorial sovereignty and some collegial procedures like collective decision-making). Foremost, the concept serves a discursive purpose as a "useful tool to rescue Muslims from the yoke of Western intellectual domination," but as a development model it has failed the communities they claim to represent (Khan 2004: 276).

DEFINITION The Islamic state is based on ruling the Islamic Ummah (أمة – the Muslim community). Allah is the highest authority in any Islamic state concept. Any leadership is proclaimed in the name of Allah (سُبْحانَهُ وَتَعالَىٰ – subḥānahū wa-taʿālā (SWT) – "Glorious and Exalted Is He") and his Messenger, the Prophet Muhammad (صَلَّى ٱللَّهُ عَلَيْهِ وَآلِهِ وَسَلَّمَ – ṣallā-llāhu ʿalayhī wa-ʾālihī wa-sallam (ṢAAS / SAWW) – "Peace and Blessings be upon Him and his Progeny"). In the absence of such divine substance, a leader (khalīfa'– caliph – Prophet's deputy, or amīr al-mu'minīn – the Head of Believers) or collective leadership (experts, legal scholars – fuqahā) is responsible for the main task of the state: maintenance of the Islamic faith. Therefore, Islam and politics are inseparable in the classical sense; they create a unity that keeps the Ummah on the right path of Islam.

SEE ALSO Like other manifestations of political Islam, Islamic states (as modern phenomena) are the expression of a Utopian alternative path for Islamic communities in the post-colonial reality. Seldom are they studied as a theocracy or ideocracy, nor was their coherent worldview and (questionable) legitimacy (solicited from traditional rule) treated on a par with totalitarianism before 2014, despite the fact that several Islamic state projects came to power through revolution, espoused a mission of bringing liberation, socio-political transformation, and even sought to export their order beyond their borders (e.g., through jihad – see below). Since the advent of the Taliban, international terrorism and especially the Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant (ISIL), the concept of Islamic statehood has been associated with terrorism.

ORIGIN The theory of the Islamic state was developed in early Islam. Even the main pillars of Islam are connected with the collective actions creating the identity of the Islamic community (Ummah) led by the leader replacing the initial rule of the Prophet Muhammad (ṢAAS). After his death, the first four 'rightly guided' caliphs (khulafā' al-rāshidūn) set up the ruling system of the community. Following the first division of the Muslim community after the death of the fourth caliph, ʿAlī ibn Abī Ṭālib, the community developed several concepts of rulers defined as religious leaders.

The community (Ummah) split into the followers of ʿAlī and his descendants (later known as the shīʿat ʿAlī – Shiite Islam) and the followers of other leaders from the tribe that assumed power – the Ummayyads, initially residing in Damascus. They seized the title of khalīfa' and spread their rule over North Africa and other parts of the world as the (second) caliphate (khilāfa'). Their title was then captured by the Abbasids in Baghdad starting in 750 CE. Although they were, at least nominally, recognized by most Sunni Muslims, other caliphates were established, initially in Spain (the Cordoba caliphate), later in the tenth century in Fatimid Egypt, and regularly (but temporarily) in other places. The last caliph, a descendant of the Abbasids, was moved to the Ottoman court in Istanbul after the conquest of late Fatimid Egypt in 1517, and the Ottoman sultans usurped the titles khalīfa' and khilāfa' until the end of their rule. The Ottoman Empire extended into substantial parts of the Muslim world, becoming the most influential Islamic state in the sixteenth century.

Consequently, caliphs and sultans in Istanbul were, at least nominally, recognized throughout the Sunni world, even in the places outside the direct control of the Ottomans (Central Asia, South Asia, Africa, etc.). At the same time, several other caliphates were proclaimed in different parts of the Islamic world – the Indian peninsula, the Kanem-Bornu empire (1472-1893) and the Sokoto caliphate (1804-1903) in what is today Nigeria, Yogyakarta in Indonesia (1755-2015), etc. While a caliph did not formally lead the Mahdi state of Sudan (1881-1898), the latter possessed all the attributes of an Islamic state.

The khalīfa' title was abolished by the Turkish Republic in 1924 when the last caliph was dethroned, after the (earlier) abolition of the Ottoman sultanate. Thereafter, several efforts to restore the caliphate were proclaimed: the Saudi dynasty defeated their predecessors in the Hejaz in 1924-1925. Still, in the 1920s, Muḥammad Rashīd Riḍā in Egypt appealed for the restoration of the khilāfa' in his compendium al-khilāfa' aw al-imāma al-ʿuzmā ('The Caliphate and the Grand Imamate') (Haddad 1989; Willis 2010).

In modern history, several other attempts to enthrone Islamic leadership have taken place, at least on a local scale. The 1979 revolution in Iran is the most durable example, but other attempts should be noted: the head of the first Taliban movement was given the title amīr al-mu'minīn ('Head of the Believers'), the historical title used for important military commanders and rulers in Islam. The most significant contemporary proclamation of an Islamic state came into effect in 2014 in Iraq and Syria with branches of supporters throughout the Islamic world.

Islam has a universal character, in which every human being is born Muslim. As an Islamic state is determined to keep the faith of Allah (SWT) and the mission of Prophet Muhammad (ṢAAS), according to classical and partially modern Islamic concepts, it is predestined to spread the Islamic faith throughout the world. Such determination generated a dualistic political concept of the world of Islam that divides it into dār al-islām (the abode of Islam) and dār al-harb (the abode of war). Dār al-islām initially included the territories under Islamic rulership, with a majority Muslim population and the predominance of Sharia (Islamic law), while dār al-harb consists of the territories that should be converted using the concept of jihad. Later on, the third category of the concept – dár al-ahd (the abode of armistice/agreement) – was added for the mixed territories where both Muslims and non-Muslims could co-exist.

In this regard, jihad does not necessarily mean the violent spread of the Islamic faith (Crone 2004: 363-373). It consists of four principal tracks: (i) the jihad of the heart (al-jihād bi'l-qalb) means the fight inside every human for Islam, personal development in Islam, and against temptations. This sort of jihad is also called the Greater Jihad (al-jihād al-akbar) concept and is considered the most praiseworthy. The second level (ii) is the jihad of the tongue (al-jihād bi'l-lisān), which encourages spreading the truth of Islam using words, i.e. missionary activities, and also warning against matters considered immoral in Islam ("the greatest sacred struggle is to speak the truth in front of a tyrannical ruler," Prophet Muhammad, ṢAAS. Hadīth, Musnad Aḥmad 18449). The third level (iii) is the concept of the jihad of the hand (al-jihād bi'l-yad), which mostly anticipates work for Islam, the community and charity. Finally (iv), the jihad of the sword (al-jihād bi's-sajf) requires violence to spread but also defend Islam – offensive (jihād al-ṭalab) versus defensive jihad (jihād al-daf') (Crone 2004: 382-383). Moreover, jihad by the sword is traditionally deemed the most extreme and the last resort to spread Islam and, as such, should only be proclaimed by the caliph. This is why several radical Islamic movements proclaimed their leaders as khalīfa'.

IMPACT ON POLICY The idea of the Islamic state and its extensive and universal character was proclaimed in most modern and contemporary movements that promoted jihad by the sword and appeared in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries, such as Al-Qaeda (al-Qāʿida), the Islamic State, and other, often radical movements. Nevertheless, the spread of the Islamic faith in some cases proceeds by using more moderate means, as in the case of the pan-Islamist and fundamentalist Hizb at-Tahrīr ('Party of Liberation') movement. The necessity to promote the Islamic faith is also present in the proselyting activities supported by some Islamic states, particularly in the Gulf (Saudi Arabia, Qatar, etc.). However, the latter's (Hanbaliya) vision of Islam often clashes with local Islamic traditions based on other (non-Hanbali) schools of Islamic Law (jurisprudence) – e.g., Hanafi Islam, particularly with its Sufi traditions. It also goes against some of the politics of several Muslim states, which declare constitutional secularity and presume the separation of the state and Islam.

Concepts of the Islamic state in modern and contemporary history also concern other universal concepts, such as human rights, democracy, and pluralism, and clash with notions of inclusiveness, minority rights protection and tolerance. In social and economic terms, the theoreticians of the 'Islamic state' also discuss social cohesion, sustainability or social inclusion, which should guarantee the equality of each member of the Ummah as well as non-Muslims living in a particular territory. These values and concepts have already been included in some Islamic states in the past. Therefore, their implementation mostly lies with the leadership's commitment to protect such rights.

LITERATURE Muḥammad Abd al-Muqtadir Khan (2004) classified Islamic state literature as divided into two discourses. In the first, debates about 'theories of the Islamic state' dominated the discourse at the peak of Islamic civilization, when the caliphate dominated, and Muslims were not conquered by any other cultural regions. Khan mentions the principal scholars who conceptualized the sense of the Islamic state. In this regard, al-Farābī (870-950) considered the state in philosophical terms, al-Ghazzālī (1058-1111) or Ibn Taymiyyah (1263-1328) lingered on the theological view, while al-Māwardī (974-1058) reflected the legalistic approach to the state, and finally Ibn Khaldûn (1332-1406) analyzed a sociological approach. The second phase of Islamic state conceptualization came as the reaction to the colonization of the Islamic world and, in most cases, "attempts at imaging the Utopian ideal of the Just and dominant Islamic state" (Khan 2004: 266-267).

In the twentieth century, several other scientific and theological conceptualizations of the Islamic state appeared. The oldest was elaborated by Sayyīd Abū al-Aʿlā al-Mawdūdī (Jackson 2010; Hartung 2014), who devised the Islamic state based on the absolute equality of every Muslim, a khalīfa' sui generis. To manage the community, each khalīfa' (member of the Ummah) should transfer his/her own sovereignty to an elected leader, who is obligated to rule based on the principles of Sharia (if not, his 'co-caliphs' could overthrow him in another election). Nevertheless, Mawdūdī foresaw only those who have moral integrity and are knowledgeable of Islam (like the ulamā or fuqahā) as having the right to become leader. Mawdūdī's radical 'Theo-democracy' was further developed, in very different ways, by two other conceptualizations of Islamic statehood written by (A) Sayyid Quṭb (1906-1966) and (B) Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini (1900-1989).

Sayyid Quṭb (A), in his key concept of Islamic Order (an-nizām al-islāmī), abandons the idea of Islamic Theo-democracy promoted by Mawdūdī, claiming that the choice of political system made no difference as long as it served the interests of Islam. He also claims that Allah (SWT) is the principal determinant of any life and every human is the deputy of Islam. However, he does not show how to organize either the state or society, or how to select the leader. He also returns to the dualistic concept of the world using the term jahiliyyah (places where Allah does not hold the ultimate position) and hakimiyyah (the Sovereignty), symbolizing the real, meaning God's rule (Khatab 2006). The clashes between these two worlds are treated by him as inevitable, anticipating the future fight against anti-Islamic (in this case, Western) powers.

Khomeini (B) underlines in his key book velāyāt-e faqīh the role of Islamic experts (fuqahā) who, in the absence of khalīfa' have the right and necessary qualifications to rule the Ummah (Adib-Moghaddam 2014). Such a theory aligns with the Shiite complex system of the Islamic clergy and their historical role in Persia and Iran. In contrast to the previous concepts of Mawdūdī and Quṭb, Khomeini applied his postulates in practice after the 1979 Islamic revolution in Iran, which brought to power the spiritual leadership that continues to rule Iran to this today. Khomeini's view of the Islamic state and the predominance of fuqahā in Islamic government provoked significant discussion among Shiite scholars in the 1960s-1970s, and particularly after Khomeini passed away in 1989. The question about the role of fuqahā in the daily rule of Islamic statehood formed the core of all discussions (Davari 2004: 121-160).

EXAMPLES Attempts to create the khalīfat or other forms of Islamic state as alternatives to the Ottoman caliph appeared throughout the history of the Islamic world.

The Mahdi uprising in Sudan in 1882-1898 was one of the first notable examples proclaiming an Islamic state in modern history (Searcy 2010). Although based on Islamic Law, it violated most of the eventual rules of an Islamic state, using the jihad of the sword and predominantly violent methods to rule over alternative visions of Islam and non-Muslims who were proclaimed infidels (qāfir) and mostly eliminated. Despite the final defeat of Mahdists in 1898, the ideas of Islamic rule in Sudan remained and re-emerged in several other Neo-Mahdist riots and uprisings in the country. Finally, the military coup in 1989 led by National Islamic Front under the leadership of Dr. Hasan al-Turabi was also inspired by its predecessors (Warburg 1995).

Apart from several other states that declared themselves officially Islamic states, like Pakistan, Afghanistan, Comoros, Sudan, etc. (Gallab 2008; 2014), the most significant governance based on the concept of an Islamic state in the post-Cold War period was launched in Afghanistan during the rule of the Taliban in 1994-2001 (an emirate) and the 'Islamic State' itself in Iraq and Syria. The Taliban leader Mulla Muhammad Umar was promoted as amīr al-mu'minīn and tried to establish Islamic rulership over the territory of Afghanistan. However, local Pashto rural traditions played a crucial role in the system in addition to the general 'Islamic state' theory.

A more universalistic concept of a worldwide Islamic state began in 2014 in Mosul (Iraq), rooted in the previous Al-Qaeda leaders such as 'Abū Muṣ'ab az-Zarqāwī (see e.g., MaCants 2015). The movement exploited the turmoil in Iraq after the US intervention and in Syria after the 2011 outbreak of violence, weakening the states in both countries. Initially known as the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL – الدولة الإسلامية في العراق والشام – al-dawlah al-islāmīyah fī al-`irāq wa al-shām), the movement quickly gained worldwide popularity with a specific part of the Muslim population as the only genuine Islamic state (ignoring other movements, such as the Taliban, Al-Qaeda and other radical groups). Note that ISIL is also known under its other name of the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) and by its Arabic acronym Daesh (داعش – da'ish).

'Abū Bakr al-Baghdādī was appointed as caliph in Mosul (a step condemned and not recognized by other Islamic communities) and he established Islamic rule over the controlled territory. The movement launched its radical interpretation of an Islamic state and distinguished itself even from its roots in the Hanbaliya school and its derivation in Wahhabi (Salafist) philosophy (Bunzel 2016) (see political Islam). Its emphasis on violence against all infidels (including Muslims themselves) attracted thousands of extremist immigrants from all over the Muslim world. The universal character of the movement was underlined by the establishment of its own provinces covering Syria, Iraq, Egypt, Libya, Algeria, Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Khorasan (mainly in Afghanistan), India, Indonesia, Myanmar, Thailand and, finally, the Philippines. Despite its territorial elimination in 2019, the movement strongly inspired other radical movements that established their versions of the Islamic state (Boko Haram in Nigeria, Islamic State of Khorasan in Afghanistan, etc.)

KEY SIGNIFICANCE The perspective adopted when treating the phenomena of the Taliban or ISIL is most commonly that of terrorist groups (e.g., Weiss & Hassan 2016; Mohamedou 2017), focusing on how they challenge the international order (geopolitics), or they are treated as 'failed states' or 'quasi-states', from the point of view of state-centered theories, or international law (Novogrodsky 2018). Political treatises on Islamic states have so far barely linked their contemporary manifestations to existing frames and classifications of political regimes.

Regarding its political ideology, Poljarevic (2021) and Segrest (2016) provide an in-depth look at ISIL's violence-oriented takfīrī-based ideological mobilization. For its treatment as a revolutionary regime, consult Walt 2015; Kalyvas 2015; Altran 2015; Whiteside 2016; Mello 2018. For ISIL from a totalitarianism perspective, see Filipec 2020; Haslett 2021. For the Taliban, see Fazli 2022. The recent (second) Taliban-takeover in 2021 in Afghanistan is expected to complement ongoing studies on such types of theocracy and their behavior (Maley 2023).

For recruitment, soft power and online propaganda, consult Atwan 2015 and Lakomy 2017. A particular strand of the literature focuses on the totalitarian education (Buriel 2023) and indoctrination methods of ISIL, regarding children (Benotman & Malik 2016; Bouzar & Bénézech 2019), youth (McCue et al. 2017), their physical education program (Gadais et al. 2022) and curriculum and textbooks (Arvisais et al. 2022).

How to cite:

Horák, Slavomír, 2025. Islamic States, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adib-Moghaddam, A., ed., 2014. A critical introduction to Khomeini. Cambridge University Press.

Alexander, Y. and Alexander, D., 2015. The Islamic State: Combating the caliphate without borders. Lexington Books.

Arvisais, O., Guidère, M., Belporo, L.C., Bérubé, M., Chamsine, C. and Mahhou, M.A., 2022. The Ideological Indoctrination through ISIS Textbooks. Studies in Conflict & Terrorism.

Atran, S., 2015. ISIS is a Revolution. Aeon Essays.

Atwan, A.B., 2015. Islamic state: The digital caliphate. University of California Press.

Benotman, N. and Malik, N., 2016. The children of Islamic state. Quilliam Foundation, 7.

Bouzar, D. and Bénézech, M., 2019. The Indoctrination and the Treatment of Children from ISIS. Journal of Current Medical Research and Opinion, 2:6.

Bunzel, C., 2016. From paper state to caliphate: The ideology of the Islamic State. Brookings Institution.

Buriel, A., 2023. Education under totalitarian regimes: The case of the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria. Prospects, 53:1-2.

Crone, P., 2004. God's rule: government and Islam. Columbia University Press.

Davari, M. T., 2004. The political thought of Ayatollah Murtaza Mutahhari: An Iranian theoretician of the Islamic state. Routledge.

Fazli, R., 2022. A Comparative Study Between the Islamic Emirate of Taliban in Afghanistan 1996-2001 and the Totalitarian State Model in the West. State Studies, 8:30.

Filipec, O., 2020. The Islamic State: from terrorism to totalitarian insurgency. Taylor & Francis.

Gadais, T., Touir, G., Décarpentrie, L., Al-Khatib, M., Daou, A., Chamsine, C. and Arvisais, O., 2022. Education Under the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria: A Content Analysis of the Physical Education Curriculum. Frontiers in Education, 7.

Gallab, A.A., 2008. The first Islamist republic: Development and disintegration of Islamism in the Sudan. Ashgate.

Gallab, A.A., 2014. Their second republic: Islamism in the Sudan from disintegration to oblivion. Ashgate.

Haddad, M.O., 1989. Rashid Rida and the theory of the caliphate: Medieval themes and modern concerns. Doctoral dissertation, Columbia University.

Hartung, J.P., 2014. A system of life: Mawdūdī and the ideologisation of Islam. Hurst & Co.

Haslett, A., 2021. The Islamic State: A Political-Religious Totalitarian Regime. Scientia et Humanitas, 11.

Jackson, R., 2010. Mawlana Mawdudi and political Islam: Authority and the Islamic state. Routledge.

Kalyvas, S.N., 2015. Is ISIS a Revolutionary group and if Yes, What are the Implications? Perspectives on Terrorism, 9:4.

Khan, M.A.M., 2004. The Islamic State. In Encyclopaedia of Government and Politics, Hawkesworth, M. and Kogan, M., eds., Routledge.

Khatab, S., 2006. The power of sovereignty: The political and ideological philosophy of Sayyid Qutb. Routledge.

Lakomy, M., 2017. Cracks in the online "caliphate." How the Islamic State is losing ground in the battle for cyberspace. Perspectives on Terrorism, 11:3.

Maley, W., 2023. Ideology, Clericalism, and Socialization: Some Reflections on the Sociology of the Afghan Taliban. The Review of Faith & International Affairs, 21:3.

McCants, W., 2015. The ISIS Apocalypse: The History, Strategy, and Doomsday Vision of the Islamic State. St. Martin.

McCue, C., Massengill, J.T., Milbrandt, D., Gaughan, J. and Cumpston, M., 2017. The Islamic State long game: A tripartite analysis of youth radicalization and indoctrination. CTC Sentinel, 10:8.

Mello, B., 2018. The Islamic State: Violence and ideology in a post-colonial revolutionary regime. International Political Sociology, 12:2.

Mohamedou, M.M.O., 2017. A theory of ISIS: Political violence and the transformation of the global order. Pluto Press.

Novogrodsky, N.B., 2018. Is ISIS a State: The Status of Statehood in the Age of Terror. Berkeley Journal of International Law, 36.

Poljarevic, E., 2021. Theology of violence-oriented Takfirism as a political theory: The case of the Islamic State in Iraq and Syria (ISIS). In Handbook of Islamic Sects and Movements. Brill.

Searcy, K., 2010. The formation of the Sudanese Mahdist state: Ceremony and symbols of authority: 1882-1898. Brill.

Segrest, S.P., 2016. ISIS's Will to Apocalypse. Politics, Religion & Ideology, 17:4.

Steed, B.L., 2016. ISIS: An Introduction and Guide to the Islamic State. ABC-CLIO.

Walt, S.M., 2015. ISIS as revolutionary state. Foreign Affairs, 94.

Warburg, G., 1995. Mahdism and Islamism in Sudan. International Journal of Middle Eastern Studies, 27:2.

Weiss, M. and Hassan, H., 2016. ISIS: Inside the Army of Terror (Updated Edition). Simon & Schuster.

Whiteside, C., 2016. New masters of revolutionary warfare: The Islamic State movement (2002-2016). Perspectives on Terrorism, 10:4.

Willis, J., 2010. Debating the Caliphate: Islam and Nation in the Work of Rashid Rida and Abul Kalam Azad. The International History Review 32:4.

Box 6.7 Ibn Khaldûn – The Muqaddimah

The past resembles the future more than one drop of water resembles another.
– Ibn Khaldûn

The jurist and historian Ibn Khaldûn (1332-1406) as he is known – his full name is Abū Zayd ʻAbd ar-Raḥmān ibn Muḥammad ibn Khaldūn al-Ḥaḍramī – was a court diplomat and prime minister for several rulers in north Africa and Muslim Spain, often moving between different polities in turbulent times after the disintegration of the the Almohad Empire (ca. 1130-1269) that once controlled and unified all these territories.

In 1375, Ibn Khaldûn took a four-year sabbatical, seeking refuge in Frenda (now Algeria) in tribal territory at the stronghold of Awlād ʿArīf and commenced work on his magnum opus. Afterward, his travels took him to Egypt and Syria, where he ended up a hostage of Timur (Tamerlane) during the latter's siege on Damascus. He died in Cairo.

Ibn Khaldûn's Muqaddimah (مقدّمة – 'introduction' or 'prologue'), also titled Prolegomena (Introductions), is a seminal work that significantly contributes to our understanding of political regimes, theories of statecraft, dynasticism, and the life-cycles of regimes. It was designed as an 'introduction to' a universal history of the Arabs and Berbers (titled Kitāb al-ʾihbar – The Book of Observations) but has been lauded as a unique, standalone marvel, far surpassing contemporary thinkers.

His Muqaddimah is a diverse, general sociology spanning history, politics, urban life, economics, and knowledge and has been considered a philosophy of history. It stands out for his critical analysis of sources (historiography) and his ability to capture and theorize social change, identifying critical junctures and larger patterns.

In his treatise of (Islamic) states, Ibn Khaldûn aimed at identifying the natural laws of state survival and thus was more empirical, historical and descriptive in contrast to his normative and prescriptive predecessors such as al-Farabi (870-950), al-Mawardi (974-1058) and Ibn Taymiyyah (1263-1328). (Khan 2004) He emphasized a rational and empirical approach to understanding historical events, which was revolutionary for his time. He critiques other historians for their lack of critical analysis and for accepting historical accounts without scrutiny.

An experienced statesman, Ibn Khaldûn was apt in identifying oncoming social changes and considered all history to be a repeating rise and fall of polities and civilizations. His insights on statecraft concern dynasties and how they can uphold unity within the ruling group and thus their grip on their empire. He was one of the first to qualify identity as a cohesive construct, long before the advent of clan politics or ethnic politics.

Ibn Khaldûn introduces the concept of ʻasabiyyah (عصبيّة – ʻaṣabiyya), or social cohesion, as a fundamental force in the rise and fall of political regimes. He argues that strong social cohesion and solidarity within a group, often found in tribes or kinship groups, is essential for the establishment of a ruling dynasty. (Rashed 2017) This cohesion can be strengthened through propaganda of a religious ideology (cf. traditional rule), which helps unify the group and propel it to power. However, as a dynasty becomes established and prosperous, ʿasabiyyah tends to weaken, leading to the regime's eventual decline and replacement by a new group with stronger social cohesion.

He posits a cyclical theory of history where dynasties rise, flourish, and eventually decline due to internal decay and loss of ʿasabiyyah. He saw this process as constant with repeating historical cycles based on the interaction between settled civilization and nomadic culture (Horák 2021: 586). He outlines a predictable pattern: a new dynasty emerges with strong social cohesion and military prowess, consolidates power, and enjoys a period of prosperity. Over time, the ruling class becomes complacent, luxury and corruption set in, and social cohesion diminishes, making the dynasty vulnerable to external challenges and internal strife, leading to its downfall and replacement by a new, more cohesive group.

The Muqaddimah discusses the qualities of effective leadership and governance. He argues that successful rulers must maintain social cohesion and manage resources wisely. He also explores the concept of the 'social contract,' suggesting that the legitimacy of political authority depends on the consent and support of the governed. This idea resonates with later political theories, including those of John Locke and other Enlightenment thinkers.

In addition, he analyzes the economic and social factors that influence the rise and fall of dynasties, highlighting how economic prosperity can lead to social changes that weaken social cohesion. As societies become wealthier, individuals may prioritize personal interests over communal welfare, eroding ʿasabiyyah and contributing to dynastic decline.

He also examines the impact of urbanization – a critical factor in the life-cycle of regimes – noting that as societies transition from rural, tribal stages to urban, sedentary ones, they lose the martial and cohesive qualities essential for maintaining power.

Excessive bureaucracy, he found, including high taxes and extensive legislation, leads to societal decline by stifling the development of specialized labor and various services. He believed that bureaucrats lack the understanding and motivation inherent in business people, which hampers commercial activities and economic growth. This bureaucratic overreach constrains innovation and the efficient functioning of the economy, ultimately weakening the society's overall prosperity and stability.

Ibn Khaldûn's work is interdisciplinary, incorporating insights from sociology, anthropology, economics, and political science. The Western need to pigeonhole Ibn Khaldûn in familiar terms led scholars of the past to compare him to Machiavelli, Durkheim, Montesquieu, G. Tarde, Darwin, Hegel, Marx, V. Pareto, T. Buckle and F.J. Turner. (Simon 1999: 13) He is also considered a forerunner in economics. Mufti (2009) explores his views on warfare and Realpolitik.

Regarding Ibn Khaldûn's intellectual legacy from a decolonizing perspective, Sehlikoglu (2024) criticizes the selective genealogy of Western scholarship (for anthropology), which often overlooks the contributions of classical Arab scholarship from 400 BCE to the 1500s. Despite his groundbreaking theories, Ibn Khaldûn faced criticism and misunderstanding from his contemporaries, limiting his immediate impact. The social sciences were undeveloped in his time, and Eurocentric biases favored European scholars. His work gained recognition only after European scholars revisited it in the nineteenth century, and early translations focused more on the historical narratives than his theoretical insights, further delaying his recognition.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Ibn Khaldûn – The Muqaddimah, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ahmad, S. and Sahimi, M.S., 2022. Ibn Khaldun's Views on Man, Society and State in the Light of al-Muqaddimah. Malaysian Journal Of Islamic Studies (MJIS), 6:1.

Al Mamun, A., Sinanoğlu, B. and Salah Uddin, M., 2022. Ibn Khaldun's Economic Theories Revisited. Journal of Islamic Economics, 2.

Horák, S., 2021. History and Evolution of Geopolitics toward Central Asia. In European Handbook of Central Asian Studies: History, Politics, and Societies, Van den Bosch, J., Fauve, A., De Cordier, B., eds., ibidem Verlag.

Ibn Khaldun, 1967. The Muqaddimah. An Introduction to History, (trans. Franz Rosenthal), Princeton University Press.

Ibn Khaldun, 2005. The Muqaddimah. An Introduction to History, (trans. Franz Rosenthal), Dawood, N.J., ed., Princeton University Press.

Issawi, C., 2024. Ibn Khaldūn, Encyclopædia Britannica.

Mufti, M., 2009. Jihad as statecraft: Ibn Khaldun on the conduct of war and empire. History of Political Thought, 30:3.

Khan, M.A.M., 2004. The Islamic State. In Encyclopaedia of Government and Politics, Hawkesworth, M. and Kogan, M., eds., Routledge.

Sehlikoglu, S., 2024. Genealogy, critique, and decolonization: Ibn Khaldun and moving beyond filling the gaps. Open Research Europe, 4:14.

Simon, R., 1999. Ibn Khaldûn: History as Science and the Patrimonial Empire. Akadémiai Kjadö.

Sulastri, N., 2019. The Concept of State and Government in Ibn Khaldun's Thought. International Journal of Nusantara Islam, 7.

SECTION 7
PERFORMANCE

10,000,000,000 Dollars, Zimbabwe (2008), a symbol and symptom of the extreme hyperinflation.

Academic Freedom in Authoritarian Regimes

Speech is a straw from the roof. Once you pull it out, you cannot return it.
– Mossi proverb

We are living in an era of autocratization, with many human rights being infringed upon. In particular, academic freedom, which is key to intellectual inquiry, research and progress, faces significant challenges in authoritarian regimes around the world and, in some cases, in democracies that are dependent on students and funding from autocratizing regimes. Academic freedom constitutes the pursuit of knowledge without controls, alongside the ability to think, write, and speak critically and honestly about all subjects, no matter how controversial.

In most authoritarian regimes, academics face some sort of state censorship and ideological control. These are a combination of structural, channeling forms of repression, often combined with some exemplary persecutions of known scholars (targeted, coercive repression) to intimidate the academic community. Due to the nature of academia and its inherent hierarchy, dictatorships can establish a national culture of collective self-censorship through a combination of direct and indirect pressures that lead scholars to avoid certain topics or viewpoints. Such pressures are: fear of repercussions, institutional pressure, propaganda and ideological control (foremost in ideocracies), an education and career marked by indoctrination, social and professional norms (peer pressure and fear of academic ostracism), lack of access to objective and quality sources (as a result of media censorship and disinformation).

The state can regulate the curricula and determine what topics can be researched and where research can be published. For example, few Russian scholars publish in international publications – and these publications are overwhelmingly restricted to the natural sciences (Dubrovskiy & Beecher 2019). Those who fail to comply with the state's objectives may face punitive measures or various forms of intimidation and roadblocks to researching freely. After the Soviet Union collapsed, so did funding for universities, meaning that some academics and institutions welcomed back some state control if it meant adequate funding (Dubrovskiy & Beecher 2019). One study, drawing from over 500 Chinese scholars, found that nine percent have been invited to meetings with their authorities, and 26 percent have been denied access to important research (Greitens & Truex 2020).

Typically, the most controversial subject is any criticism of the central government. While critiques of local governments might be tolerated, attacks on the competence and success of an incumbent central government are discouraged and even banned. Academics may face harassment, intimidation and imprisonment for researching and discussing topics that are deemed to be too politically sensitive by the regime. In the backdrop of surveillance and suspicion, many in the academic community will engage in self-censorship, not wanting to risk persecution. In Hong Kong, after the National Security Law was passed, universities faced tremendous repression – trying to cleanse universities of anything that was deemed hostile to the new order. Students were disciplined, and faculty were monitored (Baehr 2022). Hungarian academics faced a witch-hunt as anyone accused of indoctrinating students with a liberal agenda faced repercussions (Tóth 2019).

Turkey has had a long history of censoring academics, such as after Atatürk implemented reforms in 1933 – leading to the dismissal of almost 100 academics from Istanbul University – Turkish academics have been advised not to study Turkish politics or to avoid criticizing the government. After a military coup in 1960, 147 academics were excluded from Turkish universities (Doğan & Selenica 2022). Academic freedom has been infringed upon more seriously since 2014 when the government started to privatize many universities and secondary schools. Since this period, the government, under the Justice and Development Party (AKP), has become more involved in censoring and controlling academics. The Turkish government can also easily intervene in determining the curricula, and the heads of departments are forced to warn their colleagues not to discuss sensitive topics in class (Taştan et al. 2020). In the Soviet Union almost all disciplines were closely monitored, including the natural sciences, since they were associated with military production.

In addition to close monitoring, the state may also encourage the dissemination of narratives that serve the objectives of the state. The state can demand greater levels of ideological conformity, using universities as tools for spreading pro-regime propaganda or official narratives that are sanctioned by the regime. In some cases, the state tries to promote its agenda through universities in other countries. Russia infiltrates universities by opening up branches of Russian universities in 'Slavic universities,' which have the objective of exerting their influence through education (Dubrovskiy & Beecher 2019).

In some cases, the state exercises control over university appointments, promotions and funding, which undermines university autonomy. In Hungary's higher education, the government has taken over the Hungarian Academy of Sciences, destroyed its independence and reorganized it to place it under direct oversight by the government (Halmai 2019). Universities also faced pressure to align their curricula with state propaganda (Laczó 2020).

Censorship also limits international exchanges and genuine cross-cultural dialogue. In the case of Turkey, outwardly, the government encourages academics to gain experience abroad, but once they attempt to do so, their motives are questioned. Any criticism of the government is considered to be a criticism of Turkey (Doğan & Selenica 2022). Beijing also has deterred large numbers of academics from researching China. Though China rarely denies visiting academic visas, they tend to delay them until the very end. If granted the visa, academics in China then face constant surveillance, forcing academics to guess what the rules are and exercise caution (Tifert 2020). A Japanese historian was arrested in China after being accused of collecting inappropriate historical materials, which supposedly were purchased at a bookstore (Tifert 2020). There are still very low numbers of international students from Western democracies studying in Russia, a number that has plummeted since the invasion of Ukraine. Ironically, the number of international students from authoritarian regimes like Kazakhstan, China, Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Tajikistan, Egypt, and Belarus has increased (ICEF Monitor 2023).

In extreme cases, many academics may feel forced to flee their home countries rather than face limited career opportunities and risks to their own security. This brain drain then deprives these countries of valuable research and free transfer of important findings, leading to intellectual stagnation. Iran has seen a huge increase in elite migration – or a brain drain, with over 56,000 students and academics fleeing in 2018 (Vakili & Mobini 2023).

As with any move toward repression, there is often a thrust to resist and provide spaces for free expression. Educators and students in authoritarian regimes continue to resist censorship and defend academic freedom, usually through secret networks and various forms of digital activism and grassroots movements (Reichman 2019). Resistance to academic censorship is particularly important for a host of reasons. Academic censorship deters the free exchange of ideas, which is crucial for innovation and creativity, making it nearly impossible to address the complex challenges facing society. In addition, it affects a state's ability to manage crises effectively, cf. disease management and disaster management.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Academic Freedom in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Baehr, P., 2022. Hong Kong universities in the shadow of the national security law. Society, 59:3.

Doğan, S. and Selenica, E., 2022. Authoritarianism and academic freedom in neoliberal Turkey. Globalisation, Societies and Education, 20:2.

Dubrovskiy, D. and Beecher, D., 2019. Academic rights in Russia and the internationalization of higher education. Academe, 105:4.

Halmai, G., 2019. The End of Academic Freedom in Hungary. Hypotheses: Droit and Société.

Greitens, S.C. and Truex, R., 2020. Repressive experiences among China scholars: New evidence from survey data. The China Quarterly, 242.

ICEF Monitor, 2023. Despite international isolation, Russia continues to build foreign enrolment.

Laczó, F., 2020. The tragedy of Central European University. Current History, 119:815.

Reichman, H., 2019. The future of academic freedom. John Hopkins University Press.

Taştan, İ.Ö., Ördek, A. and Öz, F., 2020. A report on academic freedoms in Turkey in the period of the state of emergency. Kaged.

Tiffert, G., 2020. The authoritarian assault on knowledge. Journal of Democracy, 31.

Tóth, J., 2019. To save your country, flag your teacher: Anonymous reporting of liberal indoctrination as academic witch-hunt in Orbán's Hungary. International Journal of Media & Cultural Politics, 15:3.

Vakili, S. and Mobini, M., 2023. An Overview of Brain Drain, Causes, and Policy Issues in Iran. Medical Education Bulletin, 4:2.

Arms Trafficking

From my cold, dead hands!
(A defiant statement against gun control in the US, while lifting a rifle)
– Charlton Heston, actor and then-president of the National Rifle Association (NRA)

The world is over-armed and peace is under-funded.
– Ban Ki-moon, former UN Secretary-General

Arms trafficking, or gunrunning, refers to the "sale and/or distribution of military matériel in violation of national and international law or binding international conventions and agreements" (Feinstein & Holden 2014: 446). One approach to understanding this phenomenon treats it as a transnational crime subject to prosecution. Criminological literature, such as the work of Mackenzie (2020), examines arms trafficking through organized crime and mafia structures, focusing on procedural and technical aspects of enforcement and regulation.

A second approach views arms trafficking as a political and social phenomenon involving a wide range of actors and with a potentially profound impact on global security and stability. This perspective examines how illicit arms trafficking fuels violence, conflicts, and crime worldwide, undermining societal safety and state authority. The availability of illicit arms intensifies conflicts, increases homicide rates, and empowers insurgent and terrorist groups, posing serious risks to both national and international stability.

The issue is not just confined to autocracy: "The five states profiting most from the trade are the five permanent members of the Security Council, those that once were appointed to, in accordance with the UN-Charter, maintain peace and security." (Henrikson 2007)

DEFINITION Arms trafficking refers to the illicit trade and unauthorized distribution of weapons and military equipment, often across national borders. It plays a significant role in destabilizing regions, fueling conflicts, empowering non-state actors such as insurgent groups or terrorist organizations, and undermining state sovereignty (Langlois et al. 2022). Arms trafficking is a global security issue influenced by weak governance, systemic corruption, geopolitical interests, and the proliferation of conflicts. It also raises challenges in international relations and law enforcement as states and organizations work to combat its impact on regional stability and global peace. Arms trafficking is complex and involves a host of actors ranging from the individual rogue seller and buyer to intermediaries, transnational networks, states, and corporate organizations, sometimes with the complicity of third, fourth, and even fifth parties that facilitate the movement of arms (Rothe & Rose 2011: 2; Rothe & Collins 2011).

SEE ALSO The arms trade is one of the most corruption-prone trades linking the developed and developing worlds and thus goes beyond authoritarian collaboration, and the illegal circumvention of embargoes and sanctions, as defense industries in democracies are key players in this global trade pervaded by large transnational networks of systemic corruption linking actors at international, national and sub-national levels.

CLASSIFICATION If we speak about arms trafficking, we mostly use the term with the connection of 'small arms and light weapons' (SALW). We work with this term in accordance with the UN report from the Panel of Governmental Experts on Small Arms (UN 1997), which refers to them as: (i) small arms: revolvers and self-loading pistols, rifles and carbines, sub-machine guns, assault rifles, and light machine guns; (ii) light weapons: heavy machine guns, grenade launchers, portable anti-tank and anti-aircraft guns, recoilless rifles, portable anti-tank missile and rocket launchers, portable anti-aircraft missile launchers, and mortars of less than 100 mm caliber; (iii) ammunition and explosives: cartridges (rounds) for small arms; shells and missiles for light weapons; mobile containers with missiles or shells for single-action antiaircraft and anti-tank systems; anti-personnel and anti-tank hand grenades; land mines; explosives (Greene & Marsh 2012: 5).

KEY SIGNIFICANCE The issue of arms smuggling must be seen in the broader context of global connectivity. For instance, Grip (2015) argued that the origins and effects of Africa's internal conflicts are deeply rooted in colonialism, the subsequent processes of decolonization and state formation, as well as the resulting challenges of nation-building. Before the colonial era, societies primarily relied on their own arms production and relatively limited imports. However, colonialism introduced new, more advanced weaponry, which European powers used to subjugate and dominate these regions. According to Grant (2015: 71), arms trafficking began in the sixteenth century, and the current situation reflects an acceleration and quantitative expansion of much older patterns.

The modern African state was shaped by colonial powers, who carved it out of diverse ethnic and regional groups, creating inherent conflicts due to severe imbalances in power relations and the unequal distribution of national wealth and development opportunities (Cohen 1995: 11, cited in Achankeng 2013: 13). Achankeng (2013: 15) argues, "the concern of the colonial masters at independence and beyond, for the most part, was to hand power to a group of cronies whose mission was always not to 'govern their people well' but to protect the interest of the metropole."

Moreover, the phenomenon of arms trafficking until now has been strongly modeled by the Cold War, when arms supplies became an effective tool for competition between newly emerging states and for suppressing internal opposition. Millions of light arms – lightweight, highly portable, and devastatingly effective in the hands of even young or poorly trained users – were shipped to Africa during the Cold War to equip anti-colonial fighters, newly independent states and superpower proxy forces alike. Arms trafficking is thus very much an indirect result of previous waves of ideological regime promotion.

The recent decades are notable for two main reasons. First, there has been an ongoing proliferation of arms through illegal channels originating from state arsenals. This trend includes the distribution of weapons from post-Soviet states in the 1990s, as well as from failed or failing states such as Somalia, Libya, Yemen, and Sudan. Second, there is an evident shortfall in policies controlling the use, storage, and eventual decommissioning of weapons by end-users. This is particularly apparent in regions where arms deliveries to the Middle East and Latin America have fueled instability due to inadequate oversight and end-user accountability.

LITERATURE Although there is an ongoing debate about arms trafficking as a global phenomenon, surprisingly, there is little specific academic debate and research into illicit arms trafficking (see Marsh 2018; Marsh & Pinson 2021). The majority of publications and discussions take place outside the academic journals and are mostly published as reports or policy papers (Small Arms Survey, UN and its agencies, Interpol, Transparency International, Amnesty International, Conflict Armament Research, SIPRI). However, they primarily focus on describing rather specific illicit flows and regional case studies (see Strazzani & Zampagni 2018; Marsh 2017; Schroeder & Lamb 2006; Esparza et al. 2021) without explicit engagement in building theories or stimulating broader academic debates. Therefore, the absolute majority of the existing research comprises case studies and data collection efforts that are fragmented geographically, temporally, and methodologically. In the whole body of literature on illicit arms trafficking, there is consensus on the negative and harming/destroying impact of them on societies and regimes; however, the mechanisms behind this impact are not yet satisfactorily theorized.

The international arms trade is widely recognized as one of the most corruption-prone sectors of global commerce, with corruption being almost ubiquitous in certain areas, such as major weapons systems. This is due to several factors, including the high financial stakes involved, the technical complexity of deals, and the secrecy surrounding national security matters. These conditions create ample opportunities for bribes to be concealed within complex financial transactions and offset agreements, making detection and prosecution particularly difficult.

Corruption in the arms trade is not confined to authoritarian regimes or developing countries; it is equally prevalent in developed democracies. In fact, many of the world's largest arms producers – such as the United States, France, and the United Kingdom – are also some of the most frequent exporters to authoritarian regimes and developing nations. The political importance of maintaining a robust defense industry often shields companies from meaningful legal consequences for corrupt practices. Exporter governments are often reluctant to prosecute their national defense champions, even when investigations uncover wrongdoing. As a result, even when companies are penalized for corruption, they tend to receive relatively light treatment (Perlo-Freeman 2018; 2020; Henrikson 2007).

Systemic corruption in the arms trade goes beyond individual or corporate greed. On the seller's side, it is often an element of industrial defense policy. Countries seek to maintain advanced technological capabilities in the face of limited domestic demand and intense international competition. Corruption helps secure contracts in a crowded market where many nations are vying for a small number of major deals. On the buyer's side, particularly in less developed countries, arms trade corruption serves as a means of securing political finance for senior politicians involved in decision-making. The proceeds from corrupt deals often fund political parties, election campaigns, and patronage networks, embedding corruption deeply within political systems (Perlo-Freeman 2018; 2020; Henrikson 2007).

MEASUREMENT The arms (legal and illegal) market globally is astronomical, with the purely illegal market accounting for only a fraction of the production and trade in arms. Therefore, it is difficult to measure it and provide valid data. According to the SIPRI, the estimate of the financial value of the global arms trade for, 2020 was at least 112 billion USD, but the true figure is likely to be higher (SIPRI 2024a). According to the SIPRI database, military expenditures of states in 2023 amounted to 2,443.37 billion USD, and the total annual export of arms in 2023 was 29.104 billion USD (SIPRI 2024b), and total exports of arms between 2014-2023 reached 284,718 billion USD. In the period 2004-2013, it was 253,295 billion USD in total (SIPRI 2024c).

If we are to measure the number of illicit arms, we need to first come to the classification of the arms trade. According to Marsh and Pinson (2021: 216), there are four categories of markets according to the legality of the transactions: authorized trade, fully in compliance with national and international laws and regulations; semi-legal trade in which different aspects of a transfer may be authorized or unauthorized; state-sanctioned illicit trade involves direct complicity of government officials who have political approval for their actions; and wholly illicit trade when all aspects of an arms transfer are unlawful.

Arms trafficking can be categorized by scale: large-scale and lower-scale activities. Large-scale trafficking involves organized networks transporting shipments of hundreds of tons of arms across borders, often bypassing multiple national law enforcement agencies. This type of trafficking typically supplies arms to groups engaged in armed conflicts, including both state and non-state actors, as well as to destinations under embargo (UNODC 2015).

On the contrary, according to UN Office on Drugs and Crime (UNODC 2015), an important source of illicit trafficking in firearms occurs on a small scale and involves unsophisticated methods (called 'ant-trafficking'), such as a few handguns being smuggled across a border, often by car or in buses, with a low number of actors involved. Its purpose is to discreetly move small quantities of weapons across borders, often through 'straw purchases,' targeting localized demands and organized trade while evading detection by law enforcement (Lemus 2024). A straw purchase is a transaction in which one person (the straw purchaser) buys a product, such as a firearm, on behalf of another individual who is either unable (e.g., has a criminal record) or unwilling to make the purchase.

The problem of illegal trade in arms and ammunition is particularly confronted with a fundamental lack of data and statistics or with largely inaccurate data (see Esparza et al. 2021). Several organizations, led by the UNODC or United Nations Office for Disarmament Affairs (UNODA), are involved in providing data on the legal and illegal arms trade, including organizations such as the Small Arms Survey, which maps regional and sub-regional dynamics of the trade and small arms.

Marsh and McDougal (2021) describe two metrics by which this illicit trade could be measured – the first is an assessment of the quantity of weapons seized by security forces, and the second is an assessment of quantity based on the change in price in the 'market' (Marsh & McDougal 2021: 382). In general, the market price of illegal guns is quite flexible, with a much higher price compared to legal or government purchases of guns (Marsh 2023: 219).

Measuring the level of corruption in the arms trade is obviously a daunting task, exacerbated by several well-established practices in the legal safeguarding informality in their implementation. In particular, the following practices open the door to systemic corruption:

Secrecy – Justified by national security concerns, it is difficult to scrutinize contracts or detect corrupt activities. This lack of transparency allows bribes or illicit payments to be concealed within complex financial arrangements, reducing oversight from both governments and civil society.

Defense procurement is particularly vulnerable to corruption at every stage – from tendering to contract execution: non-competitive bidding processes, falsified post-award documentation, and bribery of officials responsible for testing equipment are common issues that permeate the trade.

The role of offsets – compensatory trade agreements, where arms exporters agree to invest or provide economic benefits to the buyer country (e.g., co-production, technology transfer, investment in local industries, or training programs) – further complicates anti-corruption efforts. Offsets provide a layer of distance between the exporting company and the corrupt benefits received by officials in recipient countries. This makes it even harder to detect and prosecute corruption compared to direct bribes (Perlo-Freeman 2018; 2020).

The role of commissions or de facto 'legal bribes' – here, Roeber (2005: 8) gives a gloves-off definition: "'Commissions' is the preferred euphemism for 'bribes.' Companies pay commissions (innocently) to middlemen who pay bribes (wickedly) to the men of influence. It is a handy formulation because it allows companies to bribe while claiming ignorance of what the middleman was doing."

METHODOLOGY The characteristics of the illicit arms trade are specific compared to other illicit activities at this level. Marsh and Pinson (2021) describe a key difference in arms trafficking in comparison to other illicit goods trade. According to them, "arms trafficking usually involves comparatively little money and few individuals or groups are involved as purchasers or traffickers. Nevertheless, arms trafficking can have a profound political and societal impact when groups involved in political violence or organized crime obtain weapons." (Marsh & Pinson 2021: 213).

Regional conflicts, local demand, and the effectiveness of governance significantly influence the trafficking process (SaferWorld 2012). As noted by Esparza et al. (2021), arms trafficking is not only a product of supply and demand dynamics but also deeply entwined with regional and local socioeconomic conditions and conflicts. It would also be misleading to think about the effects of trafficking arms only with regard to the developing countries with internal conflicts where the supply chain with illicit arms is providing weapons to both sides of the conflict. There is a whole body of literature focusing on the impact of illicit guns on stable states and societies (e.g., US and EU countries).

Greene and Marsh (2012) present two implicit theories aimed at conceptualizing how illegal weapons impact the agency of weak or failing states, often linked to issues of state fragility & failure. The first theory aligns with the argument from Boutwell and Klare (1999) that the global abundance of SALW fosters conflict in weak, divided societies (see also Krause 2017). This perspective suggests that the availability of weapons, facilitated by trafficking, is a primary driver of conflict and violent unrest. Similarly, Marsh and Pinson (2021: 215-216) observe that arms enable opportunities for violence, whether acted upon or not, and that arms trafficking typically serves as an unseen but necessary condition for armed conflict and organized crime.

This thesis has faced substantial criticism, particularly for underestimating other drivers of violence and for overlooking the persistent complexities involved in acquiring illegal weapons (Bourne 2007; Marsh 2007). While this approach argues that the availability of both legal and illegal arms, along with the logistics of arms supply, play a significant role in fueling conflicts (Marsh 2020; Bourne 2007; Hartung 2001; Sule et al. 2020), these factors must be understood within specific regional, political, and societal contexts (Bourne 2013).

Authoritarian regimes often use arms trafficking to maintain power by strengthening security forces and suppressing opposition. By supplying illicit arms to the military, police, and paramilitary groups, they ensure these forces are well-equipped to quash dissent and protests. This strategy allows regimes like those in Syria or Yemen (Houthis) to bypass international arms embargoes and continue acquiring weapons through black markets. The MENA region has been prominent for arms trafficking since the beginning of the Cold War. Isolated by sanctions, they prioritize regime survival over legal norms, fostering an environment where arms trafficking thrives. This not only stabilizes the regime internally and increases violence against civilians (Jadoon & Early 2024) but also destabilizes regional and global security frameworks.

Some authoritarian regimes actively engage in arms trafficking not just to acquire weapons but also as a source of revenue and for extending and cementing their influence. Of special concern are collapsed states where (ousted) regimes have lost control over their stocks of arms (SALW or even heavy weapons). Such states can become proliferation hubs for illicit arms, and not only for their immediate neighbors since such weapons are being trafficked globally. Post-Qaddafi's Libya, boasting enormous stockpiles acquired with oil profits, has often been labeled as a 'TESCO for terrorists' (Strazzari & Tholens 2014)

One can also witness many cases of authoritarian collaboration regarding arms trafficking to bypass international sanctions, support allied groups, and consolidate their power through shared resources and logistics. (Thachuk & Saunders 2014) For instance, countries like Iran, Syria, and, historically, Libya have set up extensive distribution networks, leveraging existing corruption and smuggling infrastructures. This enables them to supply weapons to their military and paramilitary units, as well as allied groups in conflict zones such as the Yemen Civil War or the Syrian conflict. Similarly, we see collaboration among the plethora of actors in Sahel countries, notably Niger, Mali and Burkina Faso, especially the cooperation among state-backed militias and criminal organizations linked to governmental officials (see: Mercado 2022; UNODC 2020; Marsh 2017).

Similarly, one can observe a series of collaborations at the semi-legal trade or state-sanctioned illicit trade levels, which are conducted among Russia, North Korea and Iran (see Dolzikova & Salisbury 2022) where these countries under sanctions and arms embargoes have established mutually beneficial partnerships. The special case was the involvement of the Wagner Group, a Russian private military company, in the purchases of weapons from North Korea. The Wagner Group also played a significant role in semi-legal trading arms from Russia to Mali, and (after the Russian invasion of Ukraine) once Russia came under (additional) international sanctions, there were attempts to traffic arms from Mali back to Russia (Africa Defence Forum 2023).

Arms trafficking is driven by transnational criminal networks involving a wide range of actors, from corrupt military officers and high-ranking politicians to local gangs and warlords. These networks, tolerated by some regimes, also engage private companies and local communities seeking income. However, in many countries we may label as fragile states, state apparatuses cannot monitor and control stockpiles of small arms and ammunition that have been sold, rented out, or otherwise transferred directly by soldiers, police, and other security sector personnel from their arsenals and from government stockpiles to criminal groups and other non-state armed groups (Danssaert & Wood 2017; Wood & Danssaert 2021).

The state-organized and state-tolerated nature of arms trafficking is described by Feinstein & Holden (2014). They identified many cases when a variety of agents in the state apparatuses are directly or vicariously involved in arms trafficking. According to Europol, arms trafficking is often a secondary source of income for these groups, who leverage contacts and routes from other criminal activities to smuggle weapons. There are pieces of evidence from Eastern Europe or Latin America. The post-Soviet era saw the emergence of large stockpiles of military-grade weapons, which organized crime groups have trafficked into Western Europe and the Middle East (Marsh 2015). In Latin America, drug cartels, especially in Mexico and Colombia, are heavily involved in arms trafficking. The US-Mexico border is a notable hotspot for the flow of firearms trafficked from the United States into Mexico (Lemus 2024; McDougal et al. 2015).

IMPACT ON POLICY Arms trafficking has become a prominent topic in international forums, engaging not only academia but also global and regional policymakers. Efforts to monitor, regulate, and eliminate the illicit arms market have led to the establishment of treaties and organizations dedicated to addressing this issue.

The Arms Trade Treaty (ATT), adopted by the United Nations in 2013, aims to set the highest standards for regulating the international trade of conventional arms while working to prevent and eliminate illegal trade and diversion. Currently, the ATT has been fully ratified by 115 nations, including China, EU member states, Canada, and Brazil, while another 27 countries, such as the United States, Ukraine, and Turkey, have signed but not ratified the treaty. The treaty has also inspired regional initiatives, like those in ECOWAS, that align with ATT principles.

In addition, the United Nations Programme of Action (UNPoA) addresses the illegal trade of SALW, detailing preventive and combative measures. Complementing this, the International Tracing Instrument (ITI) provides a framework for marking, record-keeping, and tracing illicit small arms, which aligns with the 2030 UN Agenda for Sustainable Development.

The EU contributes through its stringent gun regulations and coordinated law enforcement, which have curbed arms trafficking across member states, though challenges persist, particularly along the Balkan route (Killicoat 2007).

Although there are continuous efforts to monitor and control arms trafficking, there are still huge obstacles that complicate the reach of positive outcomes and solutions. In that light, Simone Wisotzki (2021) identifies three key (i-iii) problematic factors preventing the adoption of more effective steps against illicit SALW proliferation. She identifies these problematic aspects:

The lack of a unified global consensus (i) on how to regulate arms trade and trafficking. Normative gaps arise from differences in national priorities and interpretations of international agreements. Countries often have conflicting views on the role of arms in national security, human rights, and sovereignty. We should also not underestimate objective factors like differences in national laws and the capacity of states to enforce regulations that result in uneven implementation.

Weak monitoring and enforcement mechanisms (ii) – many regions, particularly in the Global South, suffer from weak institutional capacity to monitor and enforce arms control regulations. It goes hand in hand with the increasing sophistication of arms manufacturing and trafficking methods, which complicates efforts to track and control illicit flows.

Illicit financial networks and corruption (iii) – arms trafficking is closely linked to other forms of transnational crime, including drug trafficking, human trafficking, and money laundering. Traffickers often exploit complex financial networks, corruption within governments, and conflict zones to move arms across borders undetected.

NGOs and many like-minded states demonstrated that the lack of control and the vast illicit proliferation of SALW have led to a protracted humanitarian crisis affecting states and populations alike. While the UNPoA's standards and rules are broad, significant unregulated loopholes remain, such as ammunition, civilian possession, and non-state actors. Verification provisions are also weak, and states are less and less willing to fulfill their basic reporting obligations. Global solutions, such as the UNPoA, suffer from serious problems, such as the discrepancy between the documents of conferences and practical implementation measures (Wisotzki & Kuhn 2021).

How to cite:

Drobík, Tomáš, 2025. Arms Trafficking, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Achankeng, F., 2013. Conflict and Conflict Resolution in Africa: Engaging the Colonial factor. African Journal on Conflict Resolution, 13:2.

African Defence Forum, 2023. Wagner Group Accused of Trying to Traffic Weapons Through Mali.

Bourne, M., 2007. Arming conflict: the proliferation of small arms. Palgrave Macmillan.

Bourne, M., 2013. Small arms and light weapons spread and conflict. In Small Arms, Crime and Conflict. Routledge.

Brauer, J. and Muggah, R., 2006. Completing the circle: building a theory of small arms demand. Contemporary Security Policy, 27:1.

Boutwell, J. and Klare, M.T., eds., 1999. Light weapons and civil conflict: controlling the tools of violence. Rowman & Littlefield.

Danssaert, P. and Wood, B., 2017. Surplus and Illegal Small Arms, Light Weapons and their Ammunition: The Consequences of Failing to Dispose and Safely Destroy Them. International Action Network on Small Arms.

Dolzikova, D. and Salisbury, D., 2022. Triple threat: Russia, Iran, and North Korea trade arms to get around sanctions. Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists.

Esparza, D.P., Ricart, C.A.P. and Vargas, E.W., eds., 2021. Gun Trafficking and Violence: From the Global Network to the Local Security Challenge. Springer.

Feinstein. A. and Holden P., 2014. Arms Trafficking. In The Oxford Handbook of Organized Crime, Paoli, L., ed., Oxford University Press.

Fleshman, M., 2011. Small Arms in Africa: Counting the Cost of Gun Violence. Africa Renewal.

Grant, J., 2015. The Arms Traffic in World History. In Histories of Transnational Crime, Bruinsma, G., ed., Springer.

Greene, O. and Marsh, N., 2012. Small Arms Crime and Conflict: Global Governance and the Threat of Armed Violence. Routledge.

Grip, L., 2015. History Never Repeats? Imports, Impact and Control of Small Arms in Africa. Contemporary Security Policy, 36:1.

Hartung, W.D., 2001. The New Business of War: Small Arms and the Proliferation of Conflict. Ethics & International Affairs, 15:1.

Henrikson, E., 2007. Corruption in the Arms Trade – Undermining African Democracy. International Peace Bureau.

Jadoon, A., and Early, B. R., 2024. Embargoes, Weapons, and Violence: The Conditional Effects of Arms Embargoes on Civilian Targeting. Foreign Policy Analysis, 20:2.

Killicoat, P., 2007. Weaponomics: The global market for assault rifles. World Bank Policy Research Working Paper, 4202.

Langlois, F, Rhumorbarbe, D., Werner, D., Florquin, N., Caneppele, S. and Rossy, Q., 2022. International Weapons Trafficking from the United States of America: A Crime Script Analysis of the Means of Transportation. Global Crime, 23:3.

Lemus, G., 2024. Arms Trafficking Across the US-Mexico Border. Wilson Center.

Mackenzie, S., 2020. Transnational Criminology. Bristol University Press.

Marsh, N., 2007. Conflict Specific Capital: The Role of Weapons Acquisition in Civil War. International Studies Perspectives, 8:1.

Marsh, N., 2015. Shopping for arms: An analysis of the illicit arms market. Crime, Law and Social Change, 53:3.

Marsh, N., 2017. Brothers came back with weapons: the effects of arms proliferation from Libya. Prism, 6:4.

Marsh, N., 2018. The Availability Puzzle-Considering the Relationship between Arms and Violence Taking Place within States. 国際武器移転史, 6.

Marsh, N., and McDougal, T.L., 2021. Illicit small arms prices: introducing two new datasets. Defence and Peace Economics, 32:4.

Marsh, N., and Pinson, L., 2021. Arms Trafficking. In The Routledge Handbook of Smuggling. Routledge.

McDougal, T.L., Shirk, D.A., Muggah, R. and Patterson, J.H., 2015. The way of the gun: Estimating firearms traffic across the U.S.-Mexico border. Journal of Economic Geography, 15:2.

Mercado, G.V., 2022. Arms Trafficking and Organized Crime: Global Trade, Local Impacts. Global Initiative Against Transnational Organized Crime.

Perlo-Freeman, S., 2018. Arms, corruption, and the state: Understanding the role of arms trade corruption in power politics. The Economics of Peace and Security Journal, 13:2.

Perlo-Freeman, S., 2020. Corruption in the arms trade. In Research Handbook on the Arms Trade, Tan, A.T.H., ed., Edward Elgar Publishing.

Roeber, J., 2005. Parallel Markets: Corruption in the International Arms Trade. Campaign against arms trade. Goodwin Paper, 3.

Rothe, L. and Collins, V., 2011. An exploration of applying system criminality to arms trafficking. International Criminal Justice Review, 21:1.

Rothe, L. and Ross, I., 2011. How States Facilitate Small Arms Trafficking in Africa: A Theoretical and Juristic Interpretation. African Journal of Criminology and Justice Studies, 5:1.

SaferWorld, 2012. Small Arms and Light Weapons Control. Training Manual.

Schroeder, M. and Lamb, G., 2006. The Illicit arms trade in Africa. African analyst, 1:4.

SIPRI, 2024a. Financial value of the global arms trade.

SIPRI, 2024b. SIPRI Military Expenditure Database.

SIPRI, 2024c. SIPRI Arms Transfers Database.

Small Arms Survey, 2019. Weapons Compass: Mapping Illicit Small Arms Flows in Africa: Report.

Strazzari, F. and Tholens, S., 2014. 'Tesco for Terrorists' Reconsidered: Arms and Conflict Dynamics in Libya and in the Sahara-Sahel Region. European Journal on Criminal Policy and Research, 20:3.

Strazzari, F., and Zampagni, F., 2018. Illicit Firearms Circulation and the Politics of Upheaval in North Africa. In Triggering Terror: Illicit Gun Markets and Firearms Acquisition of Terrorist Networks in Europe, Duquet, N., ed., Flemish Peace Institute.

Sule, B., Ibrahim, K.M., and Muhammad, A.Y., 2020. An Overview of the Genesis, Sources, Manifestations and Impact of Small Arms and Light Weapons (SALW) in Northern Nigeria. Journal of International Studies, 16.

Thachuk, K. and Saunders, K., 2014. Under the Radar: Airborne Arms Trafficking Operations in Africa. European Journal on Criminal Policy and Research, 20:3.

UN, 1997. United Nations Panel of Governmental Experts on Small Arms. United Nations General Assembly.

UNODC, 2020. Global Study on Firearms Trafficking, 2020. United Nations Office on Drugs and Crime.

Wisotzki, S., 2021. Efforts to curb the proliferation of small arms and light weapons: from persistent crisis to norm failure? Zeitschrift für Friedens- und Konfliktforschung, 10.

Wisotzki, S. and Kühn, U., 2021. Crisis in arms control: an introduction. Zeitschrift für Friedens- und Konfliktforschung, 10.

Wood, B., and Danssaert, P., 2021. Africa armed violence and the illicit arms trade. In Gun Trafficking and Violence: From the Global Network to the Local Security Challenge, Pérez Esparza, D., Pérez Ricart, C.A. and Weigend Vargas, E., eds., Springer.

Authoritarian Regionalism

Vires in Numeris (Strength in numbers)
– Latin saying

Authoritarian or autocratic regionalism is broadly defined as a situation "where illiberal or similarly restrictive governments undertake a process of economic integration amongst each other" (Dragneva & Hartwell 2022: 95) or as regional organizations "established by non-democratic states or at least centered on a non-democratic state" (Libman & Obydenkova 2019: 2).

DEFINITION The notion of authoritarian regionalism is closely related to the literature on sociology in circulation or the diffusion of norms and practices on international and regional scales (cf. authoritarian learning and authoritarian diffusion), including through interstate organizations (cf. authoritarian collaboration). Given that a social system, including a political system, does not exist in hermetic space, it thus cannot totally neglect its environment and, as a result, reacts to its messages and generates "responses to the needs and supports coming from the environment" (Luhmann 1991). Several diffusion mechanisms can be distinguished, for example, adaptation to altered conditions where "the policy decisions of one government alter the conditions under which other governments base their decisions" and diffusion via learning which "concerns the exchange of information (…), including [that on] the benefits and drawbacks of adoption" (Elkins & Simmons 2005: 39).

In this connection, A. Cooley describes the 'new authoritarian regionalism,' as opposed to the one developed in the wake of the Cold War and believed to assist democratic consolidation, as the "agreements and treaties that some regional organizations have been forging" that imply "creating legal frameworks that could serve to institutionalize authoritarian and anticonstitutional practices." (Cooley 2015: 56) Alternatively, some political scientists refer to the 'illiberal regionalism' defined as "regional interactions in which a focus on the role of shared ideas, norms, and beliefs provides a framework for some limited regional cooperation within a common discourse that is sharply at odds with the liberal norms that underpin most Western theories of regionalism" (Lewis 2018: 119). Indeed, if the institutional dimension of authoritarian regionalism is generally recognized as inherent to it, this phenomenon can also be viewed as a process and not just an outcome, where "ideas, practices and structures spread from one social system to another," thus being 'transmitted,' 'dispersed' or 'disseminated' (Ambrosio 2010: 378).

SEE ALSO Depending on the focus on norms and values or the level of institutionalized cooperation, the literature on authoritarian regionalism overlaps with authoritarian diffusion and authoritarian learning on one side or with more formalized authoritarian collaboration, respectively.

ORIGINS The first attempts in this sense were made mostly to explore the diffusion of democratic norms and practices (e.g., O'Loughlin et al. 1998; Pevehouse 2002) based on a contagion effect. It was conditioned by the so-called third wave of democratization, which swooped over Latin America (Huntington 1991) and, later on, by the development of the European integration project. However, in the face of what is described as a 'democratic recession' (Diamond 2015) or 'democratic backsliding' (Levitsky & Ziblatt 2018), a set of literature on authoritarian diffusion appeared – see also: autocratization.

KEY LITERATURE Studies on authoritarian regionalism offer new insight into the interconnection between states' cooperation (authoritarian collaboration), especially in its institutionalized form and their political regimes, thus linking International Relations (IR) research and political theory which had been 'divorced' on the grounds that "what 'is' in the world and what 'ought to be' are very different and must be kept separate" (Finnemore & Sikkink 1998: 916).

The specialized IR literature on regionalism transformed significantly to capture and explain the behavior of authoritarian states – moving away from the formal benchmarks of 'institutional integration' (derived from successful trajectories of democratic regional integration) to informal explanations and redefining 'functionality' according to autocratic logic instead of taking 'efficiency' at (Western-centric) face value.

In addition, question the rationale of non-democratic international organizations by apprehending differently their efficiency. In this light, authoritarian regionalism can represent a form of 'shadow regionalism' (Söderbaum 2012: 60) or 'virtual regionalism' characterized by a lack of substance and only occasional or partial implementation of their agreements (Allison 2008: 185), it in fact serves different purposes. Thus, some political scientists suggest that authoritarian regionalism has a specific nature that makes it different from democratic regionalism. Though some parallels can be drawn between democratic and authoritarian regionalism, they do not mirror each other, as authoritarian regionalism "has delivered mixed results when compared with its democratic counterparts" (Russo & Stoddard 2018: 20). For example, Libman and Obydenkova (2019) point out the existence of "possible mechanisms of political impact" which can "potentially be used as tools for promoting or, at the very least, stabilizing authoritarian government," such as election monitoring activities, legitimization through participation, socialization of political elites, as well as the redistribution of resources from one authoritarian state to another. Alternatively, Russo and Stoddard (2018) demonstrate that authoritarian regionalism can serve as a regime-boosting mechanism by fulfilling four functions, namely (i) the emulation of legitimate (or perceived as such) international practices, (ii) the creation of legitimizing façade mechanisms, (iii) the delegitimization of Western norms and the proliferation of alternative values, (iv) as well as material support. Allison (2008) emphasizes the 'protective integration function' based on his analysis of various regional structures in Central Asia.

EXAMPLES Authoritarian regionalism framework has been widely used to analyze regional cooperation in the broad Eurasian region where such organizations as the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO), the Eurasian Economic Union (EAEU) or the Organization of Turkic States (OTS) have emerged in the past twenty years. For example, Costa Buranelli (2020: 1008) writes that "the Central Asian leaders, by looking at each other's experiences, prolonged their rule via constitutional referenda, have bestowed on themselves honorific titles to entrench their absolute power, have increased pressure on domestic society when conflict occurred in a neighboring country, and have seen in Russia a legitimate source of some repressive domestic laws." Similarly, Collins (2009) establishes a connection between patrimonialism and regionalism and explains how "security regionalism, some regional organisations progress [in Central Asia] because they bolster patrimonial regimes, with negative consequences for democracy" (Collins 2009: 249).

MEASUREMENT Most research conducted on authoritarian regionalism is based on qualitative methods, and the researchers frequently raise the question of its measurability. In this perspective, the study by Libman & Obydenkova (2019) is based on both qualitative and quantitative analysis, the latter referring to a large dataset of all regional organizations worldwide, though the authors recognize the limitations of interpreting their results as causal evidence (Libman & Obydenkova 2019: 63). Goldring and Greitens (2020: 320) also mention "the absence of rigorous measurement and testing of those mechanisms, combined with the frequent use of geography to operationalize diffusion arguments."

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES In spite of the apparent attractiveness in the context of the recent expansion of non-democratic regional organizations, this theoretical framework encounters some fundamental problems. If it seems to be successful in describing how authoritarian regionalism works and which mechanisms it uses, causality remains its major weak point. Some research works point out difficulties in measuring the impact of authoritarian regional organizations on their members' political regimes and conclude that there is no automatic cause-effect relationship between them. Thus, Ambrosio (2010: 378, citing Brinks & Coppedge 2006) defends that it is "often quite difficult to determine exactly when and how this process [authoritarian diffusion] has taken place or to distinguish 'true diffusion from illusions of diffusion created by global trends, correlated disturbances, or the regional clustering of domestic factors.'" In addition, Goldring and Greitens (2020: 320) put into question the relevance of geographic proximity variable and demonstrate that "both authoritarian breakdown and democratization diffuse along networks defined by similarity in regime type."

S. Hall (2020) observes that "there has been limited investigation as to whether authoritarian regimes diffuse ideas between each other, or if authoritarian values are an alternative value system to democracy." He proposes an alternative term to describe the cooperation and political intercommunication between authoritarian states, authoritarian learning, the concept that he explores in his recent work, The Authoritarian International (2023). Similarly, Costa Buranelli (2020; 2021), applying the IR framework of the English School, refers to 'illiberal solidarity.' The existence of multiple similar terms, referring either to non-democratic and/or authoritarian or to illiberal states' cooperation, reflects the understudied nature of authoritarian regionalism and invites further research on the subject.

REGIONAL VARIATION Various area studies resort to an authoritarian regionalism lens to analyze the proliferation of autocratic practices in their respective regions. These studies continue to question the Western functionalist approach toward regional interstate cooperation and especially toward regional organizations. Among its pioneers, research on Africa shed light on the gap between the purpose of interstate organizations, such as the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) or the South African Development Community, and their results (Bach 1995: 1028). Later on, this idea was developed further with a focus on how "regionalist dynamics [in West Africa] have been used to support authoritarian states and create space for hybrid systems of undemocratic rule." (Stoddard 2017: 2). Also, Fisher and Anderson (2015) explore the interconnection between authoritarianism and the securitization of development in Africa and show how Ethiopia, Uganda, Rwanda and Chad have to some extent learned from one another by finding leverage in their relations with donors and by successfully imposing their priorities onto the security policies of their Western allies.

Similarly, Laruelle and Peyrouse (2017: 5, 37) look into the link between regional organizations and regime security and defend that "the success of regional organisations cannot thus be measured solely by the success of integration processes, but sometimes, in a more limited way, by that of dialogue building" and, in particular, "as instruments that enable them to consolidate their regime security and promote their national interests." Due to the emergence of numerous regional organizations led by non-democratic states in that space, Eurasia has been in the spotlight of numerous research works to explore local authoritarian regimes' resilience boosted by authoritarian learning (Ambrosio & Hall 2017), but also to expose the limits of such authoritarian cooperation in this region (Roberts 2017).

A similar critical approach toward evaluating regional cooperation regarding their efficiency has also been practiced by political scientists studying Latin America, drawing attention to the fundamental difference between the supranational model of European integration and Latin America, where regional cooperation becomes a 'sovereignty-boosting exercise' (Malamud 2022: 237).

In the same vein, attention was drawn to the Middle East and North Africa region in the wake of the Arab Spring which provoked 'an authoritarian retrenchment' across the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) states (Kamrava 2012: 97). In particular, political scientists explored how "the respective authoritarian regimes all learned in order to adequately react to the challenge of 'late riser' oppositional protests as part of the Arab uprisings" (Bank & Edel 2015: 22). In this regard, different variables of authoritarian support have been explored, such as 'perceptions of similarity' according to which local regimes decided whether to support other authoritarian regimes and evaluated their implications beyond the domestic political arena (Odinius & Kuntz 2015).

Finally, some comparative studies have contributed to clarify the authoritarian regionalism theoretic approach. Namely, Acharya (2011: 96) put forward the notion of norm subsidiarity, which "concerns the process whereby local actors develop new rules, offer new understandings of global rules or reaffirm global rules in the regional context" and offered examples from Latin America, the Middle East, and Africa to highlight such practices. Recently, in addition to the above-mentioned research by Libman & Obydenkova (2019), Debre (2021: 395; 2022) explored the Southern African Development Community (SADC), the GCC and the SCO to show how "regional organization membership can help authoritarian regimes to strengthen domestic survival politics and thereby increase the chances of incumbent survival."

How to cite:

Bolonina, Aleksandra, 2025. Authoritarian Regionalism, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Acharya, A., 2011. Norm Subsidiarity and Regional Orders: Sovereignty, Regionalism, and Rule-Making in the Third World. International Studies Quarterly, 55:1.

Allison, R., 2008. Virtual Regionalism, Regional Structures and Regime Security in Central Asia. Central Asian Survey, 27:2.

Ambrosio, T., 2010. Constructing a Framework of Authoritarian Diffusion: Concepts, Dynamics, and Future Research. International Studies Perspectives, 11:4.

Ambrosio, T. and Hall, S., 2017. Authoritarian learning: a conceptual overview. East European Politics, 33:2.

Bach, D., 1995. Les dynamiques paradoxales de l'intégration en Afrique subsaharienne: le mythe du hors-jeu. Revue française de science politique, 45:6.

Bach, D., 2016. Regionalism in Africa: genealogies, institutions and trans-state networks. Routledge.

Bank, A. and Edel, M., 2015. Authoritarian Regime Learning: Comparative Insights from the Arab Uprisings. German Institute for Global and Area Studies (GIGA), Working Paper, 274.

Collins, K., 2009. Economic and Security Regionalism among Patrimonial Authoritarian Regimes: The Case of Central Asia. Europe-Asia Studies, 61:2.

Cooley, A., 2015. Countering Democratic Norms. Journal of Democracy, 26:3.

Costa Buranelli, F., 2020. Authoritarianism as an Institution? The Case of Central Asia. International Studies Quarterly, 64:4.

Costa Buranelli, F., 2021. Central Asian regionalism or Central Asian order? Some reflections. Central Asian Affairs, 8:1.

Debre, M., 2021. The dark side of regionalism: how regional organizations help authoritarian regimes to boost survival. Democratization, 28:2.

Debre, M., 2022. Clubs of autocrats: Regional organizations and authoritarian survival. The Review of International Organizations, 17.

Dragneva, R. and Hartwell, C. A., 2022. The Crisis of the Multilateral Order in Eurasia: Authoritarian Regionalism and Its Limits. Politics and Governance, 10:2.

Elkins, Z. and Simmons, B., 2005. On Waves, Clusters, and Diffusion: A Conceptual Framework. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 598.

Erdmann, G., Bank, A., Hoffmann, B. and Richter T., 2013. International Cooperation of Authoritarian Regimes: Toward a Conceptual Framework, German Institute for Global and Area Studies (GIGA) Working Paper.

Finnemore, M. and Sikkink, K., 1998. International Norm Dynamics and Political Change. International Organization, 52:4.

Goldring, E. and Greitens, S., Rethinking Democratic Diffusion: Bringing Regime Type Back. Comparative Political Studies, 53:2.

Hall, S., 2020. Tracing Authoritarian Learning in Belarus, Moldova, Russia and Ukraine. Doctoral dissertation. University College London.

Hall, S., 2023. The Authoritarian International: Tracing How Authoritarian Regimes Learn in the Post-Soviet Space. Cambridge University Press.

Kamrava, M., 2012. The Arab Spring and the Saudi-Led Counterrevolution, Orbis, 56:1.

Kuntz, P. and Odinius, D., 2015. The Limits of Authoritarian Solidarity: The Gulf Monarchies and Preserving Authoritarian Rule during the Arab Spring. European Journal of Political Research, 54:4.

Laruelle, M. and Peyrouse, S., 2017. Regional Organisations in Central Asia: Patterns of Interaction, Dilemmas of Efficiency. University of Central Asia – Institute of Public Policy and Administration (IPPA), Working Paper, 10.

Lewis, D., 2020. Central Asia: Fractured Region, Illiberal Regionalism. In Russia Abroad: Driving Regional Fracture in Post-Communist Eurasia and Beyond, Ohanyan, A. ed., Georgetown University Press.

Libman, A. and Obydenkova, A., 2018. Understanding Authoritarian Regionalism. Journal of Democracy, 29:4.

Libman, A. and Obydenkova, A., 2019. Authoritarian Regionalism in the World of International Organizations: Global Perspectives and the Eurasian Enigma, Oxford University Press.

Malamud, A., 2022. Chapter 16: Regionalism in the Americas: segmented, overlapping, and sovereignty-boosting. In Handbook on Global Governance and Regionalism, Rüland, J. and Carrapatoso, A., eds., Edward Elgar Publishing.

O'loughlin, J., Ward, M.D., Lofdahl, C.L., Cohen, J.S., Brown, D.S., Reilly, D., Gleditsch, K.S. and Shin, M., 1998. The diffusion of democracy, 1946-1994. Annals of the Association of American Geographers, 88:4.

Pevehouse, J., 2002. Democracy from the Outside-In? International Organizations and Democratization. International Organization, 56:3.

Roberts, S., 2019. The Eurasian Economic Union: the geopolitics of authoritarian cooperation. In Political Geographies of the Post-Soviet Union, O'Loughlin, J. and Clem, R.S., eds., Routledge.

Russo, A. and Stoddard, E., 2018. Why do Authoritarian Leaders do Regionalism? Ontological Security and Eurasian Regional Cooperation. The International Spectator, 53:3.

Söderbaum, F., 2012. Formal and Informal Regionalism. In The Ashgate Research Companion to Regionalisms, Shaw, T.M., Grant, J.A. and Cornelissen, S., eds., Ashgate.

Söderbaum, F., 2016. Rethinking Regionalism, Palgrave Macmillan.

Stoddard, E., 2017. Authoritarian regimes in democratic regional organisations? Exploring regional dimensions of authoritarianism in an increasingly democratic West Africa. Journal of Contemporary African Studies, 35:4.

Conflict & Authoritarian Regimes

Dictatorships start wars because they need external enemies to exert internal control over their own people
– Richard Perle

The relationship between authoritarian regimes and conflict is complex, encompassing dynamics such as intra-party and intra-elite power struggles, authoritarian succession conflicts, inter-ethnic tensions between central powers and minorities, military confrontations with neighboring countries, and coups.

DEFINITION The relationship between authoritarian regimes and conflict highlights fundamental behavioral patterns in international relations, which have long been central to both academic and political discourse, particularly in the pursuit of universal peace. To what extent is a political regime prone to conflict, whether through engaging in war or managing opposition through armed violence?

SEE ALSO The entry overlaps with the (lack of) constraints on executive power across various regime types, as shown in foreign policy and foreign invasion. Variations in non-democratic regimes – such as levels of institutionalization and personalization – shape their leaders' exit options and threat perceptions, influencing behaviors like repression and coup-proofing to ensure survival. Hegemonic or ideological motivations for violent regime promotion are less frequently theorized.

LITERATURE The conflict proneness of authoritarian states in dyadic relations with other states has been a major source of debate, especially in the light of the democratic peace argument (Ishiyama et al. 2008), referring to a theory that democracies are less likely to go to war with each other when compared to other states. Subsequent research has focused on autocratic or dictatorial peace, suggesting that some internal institutional checks may be able to moderate authoritarian regimes' actions, thus reducing the probability they go to war (Geddes 1999; Peceny & Beer 2002). J. Ishiyama et al. (2008) have drawn on monadic analysis – measuring conflict proneness in terms of who uses violence first – and their findings support that very argument.

Understanding the dynamics of conflicts within authoritarian regimes requires a nuanced examination of internal and external factors shaping their behavior. Internally, the nature of authoritarian rule significantly influences the propensity for civil unrest and rebellion. Externally, while democracies are less prone to initiate wars, non-democracies, particularly personalist regimes, exhibit higher belligerence, often using conflicts to distract from internal issues or to maintain power. This part accounts for different regime types and sorts insights from the main literature into four sections: preconditions (A), internal conflicts (B), external conflicts (C), and the effects of conflicts on these different regime types (D).

Preconditions for conflicts (A) Among the factors that influence a dictatorship's propensity to initiate military disputes, variated correlations arise from different forms of authoritarianism. While much emphasis has been put on the degree of personalization of the regime in the decision-making process and the presence of a single- or multi-party regime, other approaches focus on the role of authoritarian institutions in ensuring internal constancy, controlling internal opposition and rivals, and overall challenges to authority. When it comes to international conflict, the behavior pattern of authoritarianism also varies widely depending on the regime category. In that context, a primary axis may nonetheless be set to approach this issue, namely the endogenous and exogenous dimensions of the conflict.

Internal conflicts (B) "In non-democracies, as leaders may not rule with popular consent, domestic disputes may be settled through the use or threat of force, expecting that the opponents will do likewise" (Macmillan 2003: 237). If, in democratic regimes, dissatisfaction is conducted through the political system, rebellion is rather unlikely; however, under a strict authoritarian regime with the means to repress and deter opposition, the politics of dictators and autocrats are indeed characterized by key instruments to maintain power, such as the use of violence and terror to suppress opposition, or the threat to use terror and war, including civil war (Larres 2022: xxii).

It is thus in semi-authoritarian regimes that higher levels of internal conflict may be found (Hegre et al. 2001). Following this line of reasoning, it is in totalitarian regimes, where state terror (Box 3.13) is most prevalent, that the chances of internal rebellion or civil war are most tenuous. One famous example of maximum crackdown is J. Stalin's rule in the Soviet Union, during whose reign millions died either of famine (Box 7.4), political execution, or labor camps, and 160,000 Red Army soldiers were executed by Soviet authorities during World War II for desertion and the like, which is a figure that overcomes those of Nazi Germany (15,000) and even puzzled Hitler who called him "sick in the brain" (Kuromiya 2022: 7).

Under authoritarian rule, internal conflict may arise in the form of a civil war launched by the opposition, often by rebel groups sponsored by foreign parties (Brancati 2014: 317; Regan 2002); as a consequence of mass uprisings, coups, rebellion and revolutions; and/or in the context of regime transition. In military regimes, especially, mutinies and collective insubordination can lead to civil war as well (Albrecht & Ohl 2016: 40). Besides repression and trampling of human rights, the reasons for such grievances are manifold and can result from authoritarian economic development (systemic corruption and resource curse), environmental degradation (environmentalism), fraudulent elections, etc.

B. Lai and D. Slater (2006) suggest looking more deeply into how institutions in these regimes are deployed to enhance social control. They namely find that military regimes are the least effective in mobilizing authoritarian institutions, hence initiating military disputes more easily to manage domestic challenges to their power. Data between 1973 and 2004 confirm that military and multi-party regimes present higher risks of armed conflict as their institutional set-ups appear less resilient to armed challenges to their authority (Fjelde 2010). In this line, military regimes are deemed to be less resistant to internal conflict and even regime change, often experiencing difficulties in controlling popular protests. This may be explained by the weak roots these regimes have in society, as well as their preference for negotiated solutions over total conflict (Geddes 1999; Hadenius & Teorell 2006: 3; Lee 2009). Military regimes are also more likely than single-party autocracies to become involved in civil wars (Fjelde 2010). In any case, the military plays a central role either in the unfolding of the conflict, its response to it, or in its outcome.

The role of the military in leading to internal conflict following mass uprisings is well illustrated by the Arab Spring in countries like Syria, Yemen and Libya, where popular unrest was met with strong military responses. H. Albrecht and D. Ohl (2016) point to the centrality of the military's response during domestic unrest as being a determinant of the outcome. Here, influencing factors include, for instance, the military's loyalty or resistance to the regime, ethnic stacking, internal cohesion, its reaction to pressure from the people, the military's identification to conflict dynamics on the ground, and their relationship with demonstrators (Albrecht & Ohl 2016: 42). In the context of the 'Arab' Spring, however, homogeneous militaries in Tunisia and Egypt turned against their respective incumbents, because they perceived the tenure of their incumbents as being on the verge of collapse (cf. lame ducks in Box 3.14) in the face of the mass uprisings, and their loyalties to the regime could only extend so far (Albrecht 2012: 262). This helped to avoid conflict in these cases, which otherwise plagued Syria, Yemen and Libya. On the contrary, Bashar al-Assad's regime has managed to stay in office until 2024 despite the Syrian Civil War unfolding since 2011 and controlled most of the country through brutality against rebels and civilians – massacres, torture, destruction of infrastructure, chemical weapons – resulting in over half a million deaths and 11 million refugees, because the backing by the Syrian Army and the help of Hezbollah, Iran, and Russia (Ma'oz 2022: 250-260).

The authoritarian management of internal armed conflicts has also been a subject of concern in peace and conflict studies. Lewis et al. (2018) denounce how certain military victories, such as in Russia, Sri Lanka, China and Turkey, have been confused with illiberal practices of peace. To the authors, in fact, it reveals a form of wartime and post-conflict order in which violence is central and depends on authoritarian policy responses such as state propaganda, spatial politics and political economy.

External conflicts (C) The dominant thesis regarding the propensity to initiate international conflict is actually relative to democracies. In fact, the theory of democratic peace stipulates that democracies rarely and hardly ever initiate war against each other, especially when compared with pairs of non-democracies or mixed dyads (dyadic approach). Also, from a monadic perspective, democracies are less war-prone than any other type of regime (Doyle 1983; Mello 2017). However, this more than established premise has come to be treated with some nuance, in a shift to the view that liberal states are also more peace-prone in relations with non-liberal states than generally thought, highlighting the lack of exploration and comprehension of the liberal/non-liberal relationship (Macmillan 2003: 241). The consensus remains that non-democracies initiate more violent crises than democracies (Rioux 1998; Rousseau et al. 1996; Schultz 2001).

These same factors contributing to the variation of authoritarian regimes' belligerence involve, for example, how foreign policy decisions are made, the presence of domestic accountability mechanisms, the types of authoritarian regimes involved in a dispute, the importance of military officers in the authoritarian regime; the role of specific political institutions and their respective strength; or the individual features of leaders.

Though it may seem counterintuitive, there are some mechanisms of accountability in dictatorships. This depends, to some extent, on the concept of a 'domestic audience,' which may comprise an elite group the leader relies on to stay in power (Ezrow & Frantz 2011: 149). In authoritarian regimes, audience costs (cf. Box 7.1) are an important variable for understanding conflict patterns. According to J. Fearon's theory (1994), audience costs arise from domestic audiences' concern with the leadership's success in foreign policy. They are, for example, the costs leaders pay when they issue threats publicly, depending on their credibility and the consequences generated by those threats. In authoritarian regimes, typically, those costs are lower because authoritarian leaders are not held accountable by their citizens for their provocative statements, poor choices or incoherence. On the contrary, threats made in such contexts are not usually backed down. Disputes initiated by dictatorships tend to be reciprocated, and conflict ends up escalating (Ezrow & Frantz 2011: 147-148). Here, accountability may also be considered when deciding to get involved in war. According to J. Weeks (2012), in civilian regimes endowed with some form of domestic audience, such as a powerful elite, leaders may be held accountable for their foreign policy decisions, which makes them no more belligerent than democracies overall. On the contrary, in regimes with a predominantly military audience, the reliance on the use of force tends to prevail as a necessary and appropriate means to respond to disputes (Weeks 2012: 327).

Domestic institutions' roles are also to be considered in constraining the decisions to initiate international military disputes. Domestic audiences, namely, though they might be smaller than in democracies, often exist in autocracies as well and have the power to punish or reward the leader's foreign policy decision. The relative power of domestic audiences is what defines the leaders' actions as being more or less free of constraints. Generally, the more personalist the regime, the less powerful the domestic audience because the leader alone controls the state's instruments and selects loyal uncritical regime insiders who will impeach the organization of any constraining domestic audience (cf. North Korea under the Kims, Libya under Qaddafi). Conversely, non-personalist or party-based autocracies may have powerful audiences able to punish their leaders in the face of incompetence, as their loyalty is much more defined by ideological values rather than individual incumbencies (Weeks 2012: 329-330).

From the perspective of Foreign Policy Analysis (FPA), looking into decision-making processes is key to understanding how authoritarian regimes may engage in conflict. Poliheuristic theory by B. Kinne (2005), for instance, suggests that leaders have to manage different layers of complex information and use shortcuts in doing so because the amount of reliable information-gathering available to them makes it overwhelmingly difficult to make critical decisions. As a consequence, leaders will tend to prioritize their political concerns by producing positive outcomes domestically, as other more problematic repercussions, such as economic or diplomatic issues, will tend to come thereafter (Ezrow & Frantz 2011: 150). This may be illustrated by personalist dictator Saddam Hussein's decision to stay in Kuwait in 1991, even after US president George H.W. Bush's ultimatum to retreat (Ezrow & Frantz 2011: 151-152), eventually leading to the Gulf War (1990-1991).

As in other regimes, the rational calculus of costs and benefits also applies in authoritarian regimes, even if these depend on subjective perceptions of success and failure. Typically, while the costs of fighting are deliberated in material and moral terms, especially by audiences, the costs of defeat may represent the ultimate mistake of losing military and economic resources and projecting an image of military weakness. As for the benefits, these are weighed in terms of the value of what is to be won (e.g., territory, economic gains, removal of threat) compared to the acceptability of maintaining the status quo (Weeks 2012: 328-329). Accordingly, preferences vary according to the composition of the audience (civil or military) relative to the type of regime. While the preferences of the dictator prevail in personalist regimes where the domestic audience is not effective, the preferences of audiences matter particularly in the case of non-personalist autocracies such as those exposed above (Weeks 2012: 330).

Overall, authoritarian regimes are deemed more likely to go to war when faced with internal turmoil (Wilkenfeld 1968). Here, diversionary behavior – which consists of one state initiating war as a way of distracting attention from domestic problems – presents some contradicting results depending on the regime type considered. Personalist regimes, for instance, are found to be more likely to initiate an international conflict when they anticipate a coup or revolution that might remove them forcibly from power, making the initiation of war a productive momentum to suppress internal opposition (Chiozza & Goemans 2011). But to C. Gelpi (1997), for instance, autocratic leaders are less willing to engage in diversionary foreign policies when faced with domestic instability because their repressive power acts as a guarantee that it is not necessary. To B. Leeds and D. Davis (1997), diversionary leaders can nonetheless incite their opponents to change their behavior in such a way as to limit their ability to initiate conflict. R. Miller's study (1999) specifies this correlation by considering the level of hostility of both the initiator and the target, whether the initiator or target is a revisionist, hence bullying, state, and the relative power of the dispute participants, to find that autocratic leaders display more diversionary behavior and are less affected by strategic interaction opportunities than democratic counterparts, especially in the case of joining an ongoing dispute.

As mentioned above, the work by Peceny and his colleagues (2002; 2003; 2004) find that certain dyads are more peaceful than others; for instance, personalist regimes rarely fight one another, and the same can be said for military regimes. While single-party regimes are more likely to fight one another than the other categories, they are still less likely to fight one another than mixed dyads.

Weeks (2012) finds significant differences in conflict propensity between strongmen (i.e., personalist rule) and regimes led by military institutions. Weeks argues that the former start more wars than other autocracies or democracies because they face little domestic accountability. Weeks' (2012) analysis shows that military strongmen are more likely to initiate war than juntas or civilian personalist rulers, who are, in turn, more belligerent than dominant-party regimes and democracies. Evidence also suggests that military strongmen engage in more belligerent international behavior than other dictators. Lai and Slater (2006) find that military-led autocracies are more likely to initiate conflict than party-based autocracies. They argue that the military's uncertain hold on power leads it to initiate diversionary wars to shore up domestic support (Geddes et al. 2014: 157).

Moreover, single-party regimes are notably less prone to initiate militarized disputes against personalist dictatorships compared to other types of regime pairs. Conversely, personalist regimes are slightly more inclined to initiate such disputes against single-party regimes than other regime dyads. Their findings suggest that interactions among specific authoritarian regime types can be just as impactful as the dynamics between democracies and non-democracies (Peceny & Beer 2003).

Although no personalist dictatorships have engaged in war with each other since 1945, they are more likely to be involved in military disputes with democracies, either because strong democracies tend to target weak personalist regimes and are less likely to back down or because personalist dictatorships are more likely to challenge democracies (Peceny & Beer 2002). Personalist dictatorships appear to be the most conflict-prone (Weeks 2012), although variables such as the leaders' old age in personalist regimes may lessen the risk of conflict initiation (Horowitz et al. 2005). Otherwise, one reason for a personalist regime's conflict-proneness has to do with how maintaining absolute power in the face of few domestic consequences makes military force a cost-effective policy option (Ezrow & Frantz 2011: 140-145; Peceny & Beer. 2002; Reiter & Stam 2003; Weeks 2012). Another is related to the dimension of the coalition supporting the personalist regime. According to selectorate theory, the smaller the coalition supporting the leader in office, the more the leader's decision to go into conflict remains unchallenged (Bueno de Mesquita et al. 2003). As regimes with larger winning coalitions tend to face more powerful domestic audiences, they also tend to be more reluctant to engage in military conflict and to fight more intensively when attacked than leaders with small winning coalitions. In this sense, single-party regimes, which have larger winning coalitions than personalist or military regimes, could be more reluctant to initiate disputes (Peceny & Butler 2004: 566-567) but are less likely to back down once a threat has been made (Frantz and Ezrow 2011).

Shared norms also seem to play a role in the patterns of participation in conflicts. In single-party regimes, where norms are rather homogeneous, conflict is less likely to take place. There may be institutional decisional constraints at play or practical considerations that single-party regimes are more effective in battle. However, an area that should be further explored is that single-party regimes may also be more likely to have shared norms and similar ideological objectives of their respective parties. In contrast, personalist regimes, which do not focus on a particular ideology, are less subject to normative constraints, which may explain why they seem to become embroiled in so many conflicts (Peceny & Beer 2002; 2003).

With regard to how alliances are managed in war and their respective impact on the success of war, we can consider that non-democracies tend to act more in isolation, which minimizes their chances of being victorious. According to the 'bar fight theory' (Box 7.2), democracies generally win the wars they fight because they benefit from larger and more powerful coalitions, enabling them with more material capabilities contributing to the war effort, diffusing the costs of war among coalition members – which is an important expectation from electorate, as democracies are more casualty-averse and sensitive to the costs of war – and potentially bringing more legitimacy to the cause (Gartzke 2001; Graham et al. 2017; Koch & Gartner 2005). In other words, the larger the coalition democracies tend to fight alongside, the more likely and impactful the victory. This argument clearly suggests there is strength in numbers and rejoins Bueno de Mesquita et al.'s (1999) stance that when in dispute with a democracy, for instance, an autocracy will not fight as hard as a democracy. Regardless of alliances and coalitions, D. Reiter and A. Stam (2002) have shown that democracies win almost all wars they initiate and two-thirds of wars in which they are aggressed. So, does this mean that autocracies generally lack the stamina and willpower to win wars? The tendency of autocracies to opt for smaller coalitions stems from their reliance on private goods spending in their foreign policies that are channeled in their search for private benefits and related unwillingness to share the spoils of an eventual victory. Accordingly, a minimum number of partners is considered by autocracies to ensure victory. One example of this disparity is Saddam Hussein's decision to invade Kuwait alone in 1990, when the opposing US-led coalition was composed of 32 countries (Graham et al. 2017: 614, 618).

Effects of conflicts on regime types (D) Regarding the effects and outcome of conflict on the tenure of leaders, G. Chiozza and H.E. Goemans (2004) provide important and detailed clarifications. Autocratic leaders are more negatively affected by defeat in both crises and wars than positively affected by a victory or a draw in a war. Although their tenure is less affected when they acted as initiators in war – either out of competence or because of beating domestic adversaries – the conclusion is that they are "always worse off after a war than after a crisis" and do face the higher hazard of losing office after the war than after a crisis (Chiozza & Goemans 2004: 612-613). From yet another perspective, defeat against an autocrat is tied to lesser chances of remaining in office (Chiozza & Goemans 2004: 616).

Additionally, when losing wars, dictators may face retribution, but if the loss is moderate, it is less likely they lose office, for they still hold enough repressive power to prevent attempts to remove them (Macmillan 2003: 236). When losing wars against a democracy, a significant majority of autocrats have lost power either at the hands of their people or upon imposition of the democratic victor; examples here include Benito Mussolini, Slobodan Milosevic or General Huerta, among others (Macmillan 2003: 240).

Other approaches in the literature focus on the importance of the post-conflict dimension of authoritarianism. Here, the terms of the relationship may be inverted by questioning, for instance, how exposure to armed conflict affects individual support for authoritarian values in post-conflict societies. K. Dyrstad (2013) used survey data from ethnically divided Bosnia-Herzegovina, Kosovo and Croatia, where democracy has proven to be difficult to consolidate, to find that the exposure to war-related violence has led to an increase of authoritarian values years after the end of the war, mainly because of post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) (Dyrstad 2013: 1235). Dyrstad also finds that, among the three countries, authoritarian values are particularly predominant in Kosovo, where conflict occurred most recently, where violence has continued after the war, and hence, where people continue to prioritize order and security rather than personal liberties. To Dyrstad, longer authoritarian regimes have deeper negative impacts on the political culture and individual values of post-authoritarian societies, leading to weaker civil societies where value orientation remains quite authoritarian (cf. Barnes 2001).

Still, in the context of that inverted approach to the relationship between violence and authoritarianism, other research on Israel and the US has connected the exposure to terrorism and other national threats to an increase in anti-democratic opinions and political extremism (Doty et al. 1991; Halperin et al. 2009; Perrin 2005).

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES The methodological problems that arise when correlating authoritarianism and conflict actually merge the problems that typically affect each field separately and end up making it especially difficult to streamline any conclusion. The study of conflict patterns per se already encounters difficulties because it typically entails multiple and multidisciplinary causal factors and approaches such as grassroots causes, the agency-structure debate, history, geopolitics, political economy, political psychology, sociology, and anthropology, among others. When adding to this the particularities of regime types, it can be challenging to extract clear causal trends. Any conclusion appears multi-layered, as any regime classifications and nuancing may lead to multiple ramifications into the causes, dynamics and effects of conflict.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE & IMPACT ON POLICY As authoritarian regimes are generally more isolated and can run more unpredictable foreign policies, questions related to their aggressiveness and conflict-prone behavior are of interest to the international community and democratic countries for reasons related to international security, stability, order and the eventual need for interventionism. Between imminent risks and perceptions, what level of international threat do these regimes pose? In the not-too-distant past, we have witnessed international conflicts led by Western coalitions, often led by the US, against authoritarian regimes such as Slobodan Milosevic's in Serbia, Saddam Hussein's in Iraq, the Taliban in Afghanistan and Qaddafi's in Libya. In some of these cases, humanitarian arguments prevailed in defense of peoples oppressed by dictators, thus legitimizing and justifying to the international community the need and 'responsibility to protect' them (R2P). At the time of writing, ongoing tensions and conflicts that implicate at least one authoritarian party (cf. between China and Taiwan or the Russian invasion of Ukraine) have not only involved games of alliances and balancing that impact global geopolitics, as they also present potential to take on worrying proportions, for their outcomes have serious implications for the world order.

NEW FRONTIERS Recent literature by K. Jayasuriya (2023) has now focused on the current geo-capitalist conflict between the US and China, coined as an 'inter-imperial conflict,' to argue that there are political effects that emerge from such patterns of rivalry that enable the rise of right-wing forces and new forms of authoritarian rule. Such a phenomenon, to Jayasuriya, could reassert the national state in ways that could foster coercive authoritarian statism or even post-fascism.

How to cite:

Da Mota, Sarah, 2025. Conflict and Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Albrecht, H., 2012. Authoritarian transformation or transition from authoritarianism? Insights on regime change in Egypt. In Arab Spring in Egypt: revolution and beyond. American University in Cairo Press.

Albrecht, H. and Ohl, D., 2016. Exit, resistance, loyalty: military behaviour during unrest in authoritarian regimes. Perspectives on Politics, 14:1.

Barnes, S.H., 2001. The Contribution of Democracy to Rebuilding Postconflict Societies. American Journal of International Law, 95:1.

Brancati, D., 2014. Democratic authoritarianism: origins and effects. Annual Review of Political Science, 17.

Bray, L., Shriver, T. and Adams, A., 2019. Framing authoritarian legitimacy: elite cohesion in the aftermath of popular rebellion. Social Movement Studies, 18:6.

Bueno de Mesquita, B., Morrow, J., Siverson, R. and Smith, A., 1999. An Institutional Explanation of the Democratic Peace. American Political Science Review, 93:4.

Bueno de Mesquita, B., Smith, A., Siverson, R. and Morrow, J., 2003. The logic of political survival. MIT Press.

Chiozza, G. and Goemans, H.E., 2004. International conflict and the tenure of leaders: is war still 'ex post' inefficient? American Journal of Political Science, 48:3.

Chiozza, G. and Goemans, H.E., 2011. Leaders and international conflict. Cambridge University Press.

Doty, R.M., Peterson, B.E., and Winter, D.G., 1991. Threat and Authoritarianism in the United States, 1978-1987. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 61:4.

Doyle, M.W, 1983. Kant, Liberal Legacies, and Foreign Affairs. Philosophy and Public Affairs, 12:3.

Dyrsad, K., 2013. Does civil war breed authoritarian values? An empirical study of Bosnia-Herzegovina, Kosovo and Croatia. Democratization, 20:7.

Ezrow, N. and Frantz, E., 2011. Dictators and Dictatorships. Understanding authoritarian regimes and their leaders. Continuum.

Fearon, J.D., 1994. Domestic Political Audiences and the Escalation of International Disputes. American Political Science Review, 88:3.

Fjelde, H., 2010. Generals, Dictators, and Kings: Authoritarian Regimes and Civil Conflict, 1973-2004. Conflict Management and Peace Science, 27:3.

Gartzke, E., 2001. Democracy and the Preparation for War: Does Regime Type Affect States' Anticipation of Casualties? International Studies Quarterly, 45:3.

Geddes, B., 1999. Authoritarian breakdown: empirical test of a game theoretic argument. Annual meeting of the American Political Science Association.
Geddes, B., Wright, J., and Frantz, E., 2014. Autocratic breakdown and regime transitions: A new data set. Perspectives on Politics, 12:2.
Gelpi, C., 1997. Democratic diversions: Government structure and the externalization of domestic conflict. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 41.
Goemans, H.E., 2000. War and Punishment: The Causes of War Termination and the First World War. Princeton University Press.
Graham, B., Gartzke, E., Fariss, C., 2017. The Bar Fight Theory of international conflict: regime type, coalition size, and victory. Political Science Research and Methods, 5:4.
Hadenius, A. and Teorell, J., 2006. Authoritarian regimes: stability, change, and pathways to democracy, 1972-2003. Kellogg Institute's Working Paper, 331.
Halperin, E., Canetti-Nisim, D., and Hirsch-Hoefler, S., 2009. The Central Role of Group-Based Hatred as an Emotional Antecedent of Political Intolerance: Evidence from Israel. Political Psychology, 30:1.
Hegre, H., Ellingsen, T., Gates, S., and Gleditsch, N., 2001. Toward a Democratic Civil Peace? Democracy, Political Change, and Civil War, 1816-1992. American Political Science Review, 95:1.
Horowitz, M., McDermott, R. and Stam, A.,2005. Leader age, regime type, and violent International Relations. The Journal of Conflict Resolution, 49:5.
Ishiyama, J., Conway, R., and Haggans, K., 2008. Is there a monadic authoritarian peace: authoritarian regimes, democratic transition types and the first use of violent force. African Journal of Political Science and International Relations, 2:3.
Jayasuriya, K., 2023. The age of political disincorporation: geo-capitalist conflict and the politics of authoritarian statism. Journal of Contemporary Asia, 53:1.
Kinne, B., 2005. Decision Making in Autocratic Regimes: A Poliheuristic Perspective. International Studies Perspectives, 6.
Koch, M. and Gartner, S., 2005. Casualties and Constituencies: Democratic Accountability, Electoral Institutions, and Costly Conflicts. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 49.
Kuromiya, H., 2022. Joseph Stalin: autocrat par excellence (1878-1953). In Dictators and Autocrats. Securing power across global politics. Routledge.
Lai, B., and Slater, D., 2006. Institutions of the offensive: domestic sources of dispute initiation in authoritarian regimes, 1950-1992. American Journal of Political Science, 50:1.
Larres, K., 2022. Dictators and autocrats. Securing power across global politics. Routledge.
Lee, T., 2009. The Armed Forces and Transitions from Authoritarian Rule: Explaining the Role of the Military in 1986 Philippines and 1998 Indonesia. Comparative Political Studies, 42:5.
Leeds, B.A., Davis, D.R., 1997. Domestic political vulnerability and international disputes. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 41.
Lewis, D., Heathershaw, J., and Megoran, N., 2018. Illiberal peace? Authoritarian modes of conflict management. Cooperation and Conflict, 53:4.
Ma'oz, M., 2022. The Assad dynasty: quo vadis Damascus? (Hafiz: 1930-2000; Bashar: born 1965). In Dictators and Autocrats. Securing power across global politics, Larres, K., ed., Routledge.
Macmillan, J., 2003. Beyond the separate democratic peace. Journal of Peace Research, 40:2.
Mello, P.A., 2017. Democratic Peace theory. In The SAGE Encyclopedia of War: Social Science Perspectives (vol.1). Sage publications.
Peceny, M. and Butler, C.K., 2004. The conflict behaviour of authoritarian regimes. International Politics, 41.
Peceny, M., Beer, C.C., and Sanchez-Terry, S., 2002. Dictatorial Peace? American Political Science Review, 96.
Peceny, M. and Beer, C.C., 2003. Peaceful parties and puzzling personalists. American Political Science Review, 97:2.
Perrin, A.J., 2005. National Threat and Political Culture: Authoritarianism, Antiauthoritarianism, and the September 11 Attacks. Political Psychology, 26:2.
Regan P.M., 2002. Third-party interventions and the duration of intrastate conflicts. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 46:1.
Reiter, D. and Stam, A., 2002. Democracies at War. Princeton University Press.
Rioux, JB., 1998. A Crisis-Based Evaluation of the Democratic Peace Proposition. Canadian Journal of Political Science, 31:2.
Rousseau, D., Gelpi, C., Reiter, D. and Huth, P., 1996. Assessing the Dyadic Nature of the Democratic Peace, 1918-1988. American Political Science Review, 90:3.
Schultz, K.A., 2001. Democracy and Coercive Diplomacy. Cambridge University Press.
Weeks, J.L., 2012. Strongmen and straw men: authoritarian regimes and the initiation of international conflict. American Political Science Review, 106:2.
Wilkenfeld, J., 1968. Domestic and foreign conflict behavior of nations. Journal of Peace Research, 1.

Box 7.1 Audience Costs

The audience is the best judge of anything. They cannot be lied to. Truth brings them closer, a lie pushes them away.
– Barbra Streisand

Are authoritarian regimes more likely to back down after making a threat? Audience costs theory refers to the costs that regimes face from a domestic audience when making decisions, particularly about going to war. Audience cost theory assumes that a domestic political audience can coordinate and punish a leader when they make bad decisions and that backing down from a threat is a punishable offense.

Drawing from the work of James Fearon (1994), audience costs theory argued that because democratic leaders could suffer domestic consequences for making threats and backing down, this gives democracies more credibility when they are making threats to go to war. As autocracies do not generate the same type of audience costs, they may be more likely to back down after making threats. The logic goes that dictators have more control over their tenure (and are not worried about being voted out of office) and can, therefore, take on greater risks of making threats that they back down from. Early work on this tended only to make the distinction between dictatorships and democracies.

However, some scholars have pointed out that authoritarian regimes may vary in their ability to generate audience costs (Weeks 2008). The domestic audience may also not constitute the public in authoritarian regimes. Rather it is influential groups and elites that prop up the regime that constitutes the real audience. Based on the work from Barbara Geddes' (2003) classification of dictatorships, this audience is much bigger in single-party regimes and much smaller under personalist rule.

There is also a variance in the interest and willingness of domestic audiences to punish their leaders. Political audiences may not care or may even reward leaders who escalate crises and stand up to a bully but then back down (Fearon 1994). Kertzer and Brutger (2015) propose that there are actually two distinct logics at play: audiences may also punish leaders for making aggressive threats in the first place, which they term a 'belligerence cost.' They suggest that prior studies may have overstated the importance of inconsistency in audience cost theory. Governments may also be able to clearly justify inaction as the most prudent way forward to de-escalate a crisis, as survey experiments demonstrated in the case of China (Weiss & Dafoe 2019).

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Audience Costs, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Fearon, J.D., 1994. Domestic political audiences and the escalation of international disputes. American Political Science Review, 88:3.

Geddes, B., 2003. Paradigms and sand castles: Theory building and research design in comparative politics. University of Michigan Press.

Kertzer, J.D. and Brutger, R., 2016. Decomposing audience costs: Bringing the audience back into audience cost theory. American Journal of Political Science, 60:1.

Weeks, J.L., 2008. Autocratic audience costs: Regime type and signaling resolve. International Organization, 62:1.

Weiss, J.C. and Dafoe, A., 2019. Authoritarian audiences, rhetoric, and propaganda in international crises: Evidence from China. International Studies Quarterly, 63:4.

Box 7.2 The Bar Fight Theory – Why Do Democracies Tend to Win Wars?

An egg seller should not start a fight in the market.
– African proverb

Data show that regime type matters for winning wars: democracies win almost all the wars they start and about two-thirds of the wars in which they are the targets of aggression (Reiter & Stam 2002). Some studies highlight competent and accountable leadership (Bueno de Mesquita & Siverson 1995), democracies' ability to muster resources (aimed at reducing casualties), along with their selectiveness, meaning they tend to engage in wars they can win, if they have the choice (Reiter & Stam 1998; 2002; Valentino et al. 2010). In autocracies, in contrast, the effects of coup-proofing take a toll on military performance (Böhmelt & Pilster 2015).

Reiter and Stam (1998) find that the armies of democratic states tend to fight with "marginally better logistics, substantially better initiative, and superior leadership," but an important nuance is that all three of these advantages "dwindle as wars lengthen," highlighting that the importance of individual initiative, nourished in democratic culture, also applies to battlefields.

Graham et al. (2017: 614) pose a different take on this phenomenon and find "that democracies prevail due to quantity (not quality), by fighting alongside a larger number of countries in most of their contests." Just like in a bar fight, 'numbers matter' and having more comrades in a fight must often prove to be an advantage, one that is likely to be valuable regardless of regime type. Their conclusion thus pertains to the ideological outlook of regimes, namely that the "biggest martial asset of democracies may well be that they are better at making friends, not that they are better at vanquishing their enemies" (Graham et al. 2017: 614).

A study corroborating some of these findings is Zielinski et al. (2023), which applies the selectorate theory to different regimes' war capacity and war aims, using three examples for the world wars. They find that democratic states, with capital-heavy forces and objectives that favor international collective goods, tend to shirk and free-ride on their partners' efforts in fighting. In contrast, non-democracies rely on labor-heavy forces and emphasize private goods war aims. The latter are therefore hesitant to form coalitions in the first place and are likely to push for operations that benefit them more than the collective. As a result, mixed-regime battlefield coalitions create conflicting pressures that undermine cohesion and coordination.

Another take is the perception of the enemy and states' expectations of what they are getting into. The higher the uncertainty about the opponent's regime type, the less likely will disputes lead to conflict initiation and escalation; conflict-dyads with greater uncertainty are less likely to experience conflict onset (Bas & Orsun 2021).

Most of these studies apply selectorate theory to distinguish between democracies and non-democracies, but further regime differentiation is needed to expose the behavioral nuances among autocratic regime types (e.g., Weeks 2012) – cf. conflict & authoritarian regimes and Box 7.1 on 'audience costs.'

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. The Bar Fight Theory – Why Democracies Tend to Win Wars? Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bas, M.A. and Orsun, O.F., 2021. Regime uncertainty and interstate conflict. International Studies Quarterly, 65:3.

Böhmelt, T. and Pilster, U., 2015. The impact of institutional coup-proofing on coup attempts and coup outcomes. International Interactions, 41:1.

Bueno de Mesquita, Bruce, and Siversonn R.M., 1995. War and the Survival of Political Leaders – A Comparative Study of Regime Types and Political Accountability. American Political Science Review, 89:4.

Graham, B.A., Gartzke, E. and Fariss, C.J., 2017. The bar fight theory of international conflict: Regime type, coalition size, and victory. Political Science Research and Methods, 5:4.

Reiter, D. and Stam III, A.C., 1998. Democracy and battlefield military effectiveness. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 42:3.

Reiter, D. and Stam III, A.C., 2002. Democracies at War. Princeton University Press.

Valentino, B.A., Huth, P.K. and Croco, S.E., 2010. Bear any burden? How democracies minimize the costs of war. The Journal of Politics, 72:2.

Weeks, J.L., 2012. Strongmen and straw men: authoritarian regimes and the initiation of international conflict. American Political Science Review, 106:2.

Zielinski, R.C., Grauer, R. and Smith, A., 2023. Regime Type, War Aims, and Coalition Member Effort in Combat. In Understanding Battlefield Coalitions. Routledge.

Cyber-Warfare & Authoritarianism

We live in a world where all wars will begin as cyber wars (...)
It's the combination of hacking and massive, well-coordinated disinformation campaigns.
– Jared Cohen, Advisor to Hillary Clinton

From the point of view of international law and international relations, war is an institution, just like the state is. The development of information and communication technology (ICT) is constantly changing the functioning style of institutions as they are revised by new generations of people using digital technologies in their professional and private lives. The ways of managing hierarchical institutions are changing, and they function more slowly and less efficiently than network institutions. The digital revolution also brings about contestation of the monopoly of state power, and on a global scale, it undermines the hierarchical structure of superpowers. Cyberwar entails attacks on critical infrastructure, including the military, in order to cause organizational chaos and organizational failure of the state. Cyberwar is treated as an activity undertaken mainly to support "fighting in the physical domain," although there are forecasts (see 'new frontiers' – below) that treat cyberwar as the dominant type of war in the future.

DEFINITION & CLASSIFICATIONS With the evolution of technological progress and changes in the use of cyber-attacks, the definitions of cyber-warfare remain vague and broad. This allows for the possibility of new dimensions of combat activity in cyberspace to emerge. Cyberwar is an asymmetric conflict taking place in the technological space of the so-called 'cyberspace,' where geographical distance does not matter. The fight takes into account a set of physical infrastructure (fiber optics, satellites, servers), information (the content of the message associated with a cyber-attack) and IT (codes, security) elements created and modified by humans. The asymmetric nature of the conflict means that both non-state actors and states incapable of conventional attack can cause disruptions in the systems of highly developed countries that are difficult to detect. Clarke and Knake (2011) defined cyberwar as actions by a nation-state to penetrate another nation's computers or networks in order to cause damage or disruption. For comparison, Lidel and Piasecka (2011) wrote about cybernetic warfare involving non-state actors (cf. terrorism).

With over 30 years of studies on cyber-attacks targeting states or launched by states on other international actors, several basic distinctions have emerged related to activities with the characteristics of cyber war. According to Arquilla & Ronfeld (1993), we can distinguish between a 'netwar' (a war taking place on the Internet using information and connections of a network nature) and a 'cyberwar,' which uses currently available means of IT attack.

Among researchers and military experts, the term 'information warfare' was used, which originally referred to the typology of forms of hacker attacks (Ciborowski 1995; Denning 1998) aimed at political and state security goals. The concept was based on the belief that new digital tools would be used as an attack tool and that they should become a component of the security infrastructure.

The concept of information warfare can comprise online attacks carried out by states or non-state entities, the purpose of which is to have a psychological impact on society by changing perceptions, introducing disorientation, reducing trust in public authorities and increasing intra-state conflicts. In this case, the weapon of information is distributed through technical digital tools. In information warfare, the important components are the speed of message transfer, the ability to directly reach an uninformed, trusting recipient, low cost and risk of executing an attack.

Information warfare refers to the concept of Aquilla & Ronfeld (1993), where the concept of 'netwar' refers to social perception, and its components are political propaganda, classic diplomacy and new types of diplomacy, information campaigns drawing attention to a specific problem (e.g., refugee crisis, climate crisis), psychological campaigns, political and cultural subversion. Netwar essentially means a war on information distributed via the Internet. Key groups of people capable of receiving deformed information and succumbing to it (parties, minorities, professional groups, general voters, intellectual elites, power elites) are indicated as the target of the attack. In the middle of the last decade, the concept of netwar has evolved and has referred to the information war accompanying Russian aggression against Ukraine in Donbas and Crimea and the exposed Russian influence on the electoral process and outcome during the US presidential elections of 2016 (Donald J. Trump vs. Hillary Clinton). During this time, the concept of netwar was expanded to include social media's propaganda influence. Social media as a space for potential subversive activities of 'troll farms' – institutionalized groups AKA 'keyboard armies' hired to provoke, manipulate and disinform online audiences – has become a new arena for the implementation of netwar.

'Information age war' is also used (Sienkiewicz & Świeboda 2009) to mean all forms of hostile technical and information influence that, via digital technologies (including the Internet), are intended to bring expected damage to the stability of the attacked international entity (state and non-state). In line with the classification of conventional wars, the following terms can be found in the literature: 'total' and 'limited' cyberwar, as well as 'ad hoc' and 'long-term' cyberwar (Rattray 2009).

SEE ALSO Linked to digital authoritarianism, this topic relates to conflict and foreign policy in dictatorships, although cyber-terrorism can be an element of state-sponsored terrorism.

ORIGIN ICT developed as a tool during the Cold War rivalry. The ARPANET (Advanced Research Projects Agency Network) and its continuations had their origins in the military sector. They were used to facilitate, accelerate and encrypt communication between sectors and units of the American army. The concept of cyberwar also has Anglo-Saxon and American roots. D. Denning and RAND Cooperation experts are considered to be the first authors to consider the issue of cyberwar. (Denning 1998; Arquilla & Ronfeld 1993). The development of the concept evolved from the assumption that (in libertarian cyberspace) cyber-attacks can be a tool of political pressure on undemocratic governments that violate human rights (e.g., the case of international hacktivists' support for the Indigenous uprising in the state of Chiapas in Mexico in 1998). Later, examples of the use of cyber-attacks during the Second Russian-Chechen War (1999-2009) were observed as technological retaliation against Russia. It was then that the first interpretations from the Russian military command appeared that cyber-attacks would be treated as actions equivalent to a conventional attack (Bógdał-Brzezińska & Gawrycki 2003). Western analysts proposed introducing such an interpretation into the security strategy only after the successful Russian cyber-attack on Estonia in 2007 (Rattray 2009). Currently, the term cyber-attacks is used equally to cyber-warfare (Whyte & Mazanec 2019).

KEY SIGNIFICANCE The concept of cyberwar(fare) has broadened the field of analysis of state security and international security. It strengthened the importance of the technological factor in the discourse within the Realist approach to International Relations. A dualism emerged regarding the relationship between digital power (cyber-power) and cyber-resilience and cyber-sovereignty capabilities (Russia, China). All this contributed to the development of the theory of international relations by introducing the concept of cyber-sovereignty, international order in cyberspace, and cyber-power into the literature. Cyber-warfare has changed the perception of technological progress on security policy, patterns and classifications of conflicts, and verification of interactions between participants in international relations. (Whyte & Mazanec 2019). This will further influence the blurring of the boundaries between the traditional realistic, liberal-institutional and constructivist approaches in international relations.

For authoritarian regimes specifically, digital transformation has altered their capabilities of monitoring, controlling and indoctrinating their own populations while at the same time offering new tools to cause havoc abroad, either as a new dimension to political conflict – increasingly normalized (Cavelty & Egloff 2019) – or as a new sphere for diversion, like influencing elections campaigns abroad, promoting illiberal beliefs and eroding trust in open societies (Barma et al. 2020). Democratic backsliding has been accelerated by authoritarian control of cyberspace and digital freedoms (cf. autocratization). In contrast, the anticipated fallout of cyber-terrorism has not (yet) occurred since such groups still lack the wherewithal or the human capital needed to mount cyber-terror operations on a meaningful level (Arquilla 2021).

LITERATURE The literature on cyberwars is very extensive and diverse. It is easier to point to pioneering works than to isolate them. The first publications with a recognized contribution to the development of the concept of cyberwar were written by American scholars. These include D.E. Denning's Information Warfare and Security (1998) or the famous report by J. Arquilla and D. Ronfeldt (1993) Cyberwar is coming!

In other languages, notable pioneering works in Polish are L. Ciborowski's unique work Walka informacyjna (1999); A. Bógdał-Brzezińska and M.F. Gawrycki (2003); Lakomy (2015); and in German: Thomas Beer's (2005) popular work Cyberwar – Bedrohung für die Informationsgesellschaft.

After Russia's cyber-offensives against Estonia and Georgia, the number of publications on cyberwar increased, and further works appeared that organized the issues of digital warfare. A collective work known as the Tallinn Manual on the International Law Applicable to Cyber Warfare (Schmitt 2013; 2017) has become an important publication. A classic work questioning the potentially destructive impact of cyberwar was Thomas Rid's book Cyber War Will Not Take Place (2012). The French perspective is well presented in the work entitled Cyberwar and Information Warfare, edited by Daniel Ventre (2012). A comprehensive introduction is the book by P.W. Singer & A. Friedman, Cybersecurity and Cyberwar: What Everyone Needs to Know (2014). For more recent works, consult Greenberg 2019; Perlroth 2021.

Most (political) studies have approached the issue from a military and strategic perspective, treating states as black boxes, but specifically for the study of authoritarian regimes, the phenomenon remains understudied: C. Babb's (2022) dissertation is the first attempt to empirically test if authoritarian strategies in cyberspace align with the legitimation strategies expected of particular autocratic regime types.

REGIONAL VARIATION For authoritarian cases, the most notorious culprits have received the most attention. For a recent work comparing Russia and China, consult Van Wie Davis 2021. On Russia specifically, see: Foxal 2016; Connell & Vogler 2017; Blank 2017; Maréchal 2017; Jamieson 2020; on China: Krekel et al. 2009; Hjortdal 2011; Hagestad II 2012; Caplan 2013; Fritz 2017; on Iran: Caplan 2013; Martins 2018; Easttom & Butler 2021; against Iran: Farwell & Rhozinski 2011; Shakarian 2011; on North Korea: Kshetri 2014; Chung et al. 2016; Whyte 2016, Ji-Young et al. 2019.

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES The phenomenon of cyber war is treated as unquantifiable; in addition, such attacks are elements of larger stealth or covert operations. There are known data on suspected attacks on specific countries, but due to the undetectability of the perpetrators of the attacks, these data are circumstantial and hypothetical. For the above reasons, it is difficult to estimate the value of losses incurred as a result of cyber-attacks. They are identified with high probability but not with complete certainty. It would be fair to admit that it is impossible to fully distinguish between the deliberate use of technical cyber-aggression tools and human error in software or its use.

MEASUREMENT The phenomenon of disinformation is also researched through case studies rather than measurement (Wojnowski 2019). However, there are statistics and auxiliary rankings that update the susceptibility and sensitivity of countries and regions to cyber-attacks. Among them, it is worth mentioning the Global Cybersecurity Index (GCI) prepared by a subsidiary of the United Nations – the International Telecommunication Union. Others are the *Significant Cyber Incident*s tracker administered by the Center for Strategic and International Studies (CSIS), the Cyber Operations Tracker from the Council on Foreign Relations, and the Dyadic Cyber Incident and Dispute Dataset (DCID) by Maness et al. (2023).

EXAMPLES By the 1990s, states were reflecting on security threats arising from cyberspace. The relationship between the growing saturation of digital technologies in the economies (especially critical infrastructure) of highly developed countries and their increasing susceptibility to cyber-attacks was emphasized. The dominant role in the escalation of cyber-threats was assigned to the so-called 'hacktivists' and 'cyber-terrorists,' emphasizing their non-state status and anti-state attitude. Examples of the first effective cyber-terrorist activities include Serbian hacker attacks on NATO servers during the Kosovo War (1997), attacks on Mexican government websites and servers as a form of support for indigenous insurgents in the state of Chiapas (in 1998), and cyber-attacks on the Russian banking system by groups supporting the Chechen insurgents (in 2001).

In the next decade, there were many instances of countries using combat tools in cyberspace. In the years 2000-2003, a cyber-media war broke out between the US and the non-state actors based in the Middle East. Hezbollah's cyber-attack on large American websites and the disappearance of Yahoo!, Amazon, CNN and eBay websites resulted in an American cyber-attack on Al-Jazeera. Digital attacks attributed to the US (and Israel) also include the use of software called 'Stuxnet' in 2010, which blocked production systems mainly in Asian countries (Iran, Indonesia, China, and India).

In 2007, there were cyber-attacks on Estonian government websites, which, due to the dynamic development of its computer technologies during the USSR (Estonia was the most digitized country in the region), was made that much easier. Russian-speaking hacker groups claimed responsibility for both these series of attacks and the attacks on the government websites of Georgia and Lithuania in 2008, although it was partly in retaliation for the Georgian digital attack on the websites of the South Ossetian administration.

In 2009, there was an attack on Internet providers in Kyrgyzstan; a series of attacks blocking critical infrastructure and state administration websites were also carried out against Ukraine during the war with Russia in 2014. Chinese cyber-attacks have evolved along with the rapid technological development of the PRC. Since 2006, actions have been carried out aimed at international institutions (including the United Nations and ASEAN), governments (including Germany, New Zealand, Denmark, Japan and India), and a year later, an attack on the American departments of commerce, defense and state, and attempts were made to take over digital security of its energy infrastructure.

In 2016-2017, attacks using encryption software called 'Petya/NotPetya' were reported, which affected companies in Ukraine but also companies from Denmark, Spain, the Netherlands, France and the United Kingdom. In turn, the spectacular attack using the 'WannaCry' software in 2017 is attributed to North Korea. Hacker groups associated with North Korea dominate financial extortion schemes that enrich the regime's unstable budget.

Iranian hackers are mainly credited with provocative retaliatory actions directed against the governments of the US, Israel, and China. Cyber-intelligence activities are also used against its own ethnic and religious minorities, as well as violating the principles of industrial property protection. Russian cyber-aggression against Ukraine in 2022 is evidence of its underestimation of Ukraine's cyber resistance against hostile attacks and a lack of skillful coordination of conventional actions.

IMPACT ON POLICY The concept of cyberwar was created in response to the new phenomenon of using the Internet and computer systems to weaken the defense potential and the broadly understood sphere of security of states and non-state entities. As a result of constant improvements in technology, cyberwar brought rapid changes in the security policy of states and their allied groups. It also influenced society's awareness of new technological threats.

Cyberwar(fare) also found its place as an element of the concept of asymmetric conflicts and hybrid wars. In the latter case, it is worth mentioning the Russian concept of a 'new type of war' associated with the name of V. Gerasimov from 2013 (the so-called Gerasimov doctrine). The experience of cyber-attacks used in the Russia-Ukraine war in 2022 has challenged the concept of total war with elements of cyber war. The authoritarian Russian regime was surprisingly poorly prepared to launch simultaneous long-term conventional attacks synchronized with cyber-attacks.

The growing scale of cyber-attacks has brought groundbreaking declarations for international security by superpowers and key international organizations, pointing to cyberspace as an area of military operations. In the face of cyber-attacks, a state may exercise the right to retaliate according to the principles of jus ad bellum, and the provisions of Article 51 of the United Nations Charter on the right to self-defense do not exclude its application to non-state entities. There is a similar interpretation of NATO's Article 5. The right to self-defense in cyberspace has been reserved, for example, by Russia, Turkey, Australia, New Zealand and Israel. This practice concerns countries that are both the most vulnerable to threats, and often themselves accused of cyber-aggression.

Russia has been particularly worried about cyber-warfare for some time now. At the beginning of the twenty-first century, warnings came from the Russian ministries of security regarding cyber-attacks as grounds for retaliation with the use of conventional weapons. Although the first (2000) and second (2016) information security doctrines of the Russian Federation integrate the problems of information transfer security with digital security, Russia has not yet adopted documents on the status of a cyber-security strategy or doctrine, but it does influence the policy of Western countries in this field. After Russian attacks on critical infrastructure in Estonia (2007), the foundations of the alliance's cyber-security policy were adopted at the NATO summit in Prague in 2008, and in 2016, during the summit in Warsaw, cyberspace was indicated as a new sphere of allied operations. The US, as a key member of NATO, introduced a unit called USCYBERCOM into the structure of the Department of Defense in 2009, i.e., the Combat Command for Cyberspace Operations, which was transformed into an independent offensive structure in 2017. With the rapid adoption of Artificial Intelligence (AI) into cyber-weapon arsenals, some countries such as Canada and Finland developed national AI strategies in 2017, closely followed by Japan, France, Germany and the UK in 2018. Other countries such as Brazil, Egypt, Hungary, Poland and Spain have recently launched national AI strategies.

NEW FRONTIERS New war scenarios are emerging in the debate on the future of the robotization of war. The concept of 'swarm war' develops the network-centric war (net-space war) popularized in the 1990s and applies it to conducting operational activities involving miniaturized drones, robot soldiers and highly automated command systems (Shaw 2017). The challenges facing the study of cyberwar emanate from the speed of ICT changes and the emergence of new solutions such as intelligent weapons, swarm strategy, etc. AI is pointed out as a key tool establishing a new level of challenges and threats to the cyber-security of countries and the enormous possibilities of cyberwar (Sayler 2020; Allen & Chen 2017). New interpretations of combat tactics appear. The potential ineffectiveness of military command with a hierarchical structure and the need to increase the level of autonomy of units operating on the battlefield are pointed out. Competition in the use of intelligent weapons based on AI also brings benefits such as reduced human losses, increased reaction speed to threats, and increased effectiveness through the miniaturization of combat technologies as a result of advancements in cyber-warfare, a new understanding of the traditional concept of proxy wars is emerging. Proxy war, in the new sense of the word, means that people are being replaced by technology and traditional combat space is being replaced by cyberspace (or perhaps outer space).

American experts have alerted that China is currently experimenting with new dimensions of psychological warfare using ICT, which is close to the problems of information warfare but also has new features of cognitive warfare (Beauchamp-Mustafaga 2023).

New research is also focusing on the possibilities of disinformation on an unprecedented scale. This disinformation targets not only societies of hostile countries, but, thanks to the progress of AI applications, the power of elites and military command. This topic offers new research opportunities at the intersection of cognitive psychology, political science and security studies.

How to cite:

Bógdał-Brzezińska, Agnieszka, 2025. Cyber-warfare and Authoritarianism, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Allen, G. and Chen, T., 2017. Artificial Intelligence and National Security. Belfer Center for Science and International Affairs, Harvard Kennedy School.

Arquilla, J. and Ronfeldt, D., 1993, Cyberwar is coming! Comparative Strategy, 12:2.

Arquilla, J., 2021. Bitskrieg: the new challenge of cyberwarfare. John Wiley & Sons.

Babb, C., 2022. Digital Dictators: How Different Types of Authoritarian Regimes Use Cyber Attacks to Legitimize Their Rule. Doctoral dissertation, Carleton University.

Barma, A., Durbin, B. and Kendall-Taylor, A.,2020. Digital Authoritarianism: Finding Our Way Out of the Darkness, War on the Rocks.

Beauchamp-Mustafaga, N., 2023. Chinese Next-Generation Psychological Warfare: The Military Applications of Emerging Technologies and Implications for the United States. RAND Corporation.

Beer, T., 2005. Cyberwar – Bedrohung für die Informationsgesellschaft. Tectum Wissenschaftsverlag.

Blank, S., 2017. Cyber war and information war a la russe. Understanding cyber conflict: Fourteen analogies. Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Bógdał-Brzezińska, A., Gawryck,i M.F., 2003. Cyberterroryzm i problemy bezpieczeństwa informacyjnego. ASPRA-JR

Caplan, N., 2013. Cyber War: The Challenge to National Security. Global Security Studies, 4:1.

Cavelty, M.D. and Egloff, F.J., 2019. The politics of cybersecurity: Balancing different roles of the state. St Antony's International Review, 15:1.

Chung, M.K., Lim, J.I. and Kwon, H.Y., 2016. A Study on North Korea's Cyber Attacks and Countermeasures. Journal of Information Technology Services, 15:1.

Ciborowski, L., 1999.Walka informacyjna. Wydawnictwo Adam Marszałek.

Clarke, R.A. and Knake, R., 2011. Cyber War: The Next Threat to National Security and What to Do About It. Ecco.

Connell, M. and Vogler, S., 2017. Russia's approach to cyber warfare. CNA.

Denning, D.E., 1998. Information Warfare and Security. Addison-Wesley.

Easttom, C. and Butler, W., 2021. The Iran-Saudi cyber conflict. International Journal of Cyber Warfare and Terrorism (IJCWT), 11:2.

Farwell, J.P. and Rohozinski, R., 2011. Stuxnet and the future of cyber war. Survival, 53:1.

Foxall, A., 2016. Putin's cyberwar: Russia's statecraft in the fifth domain. Russia Studies Centre Policy Paper, 9.

Fritz, J.R., 2017. China's cyber warfare: the evolution of strategic doctrine. Lexington books.

Greenberg, A., 2019. Sandworm: A New Era of Cyberwar and the Hunt for the Kremlin's Most Dangerous Hackers. Anchor.

Hagestad II, W., 2012. 2*1st century Chinese cyberwarfare*. IT Governance Ltd.

Hjortdal, M., 2011. China's use of cyber warfare: Espionage meets strategic deterrence. Journal of Strategic Security, 4:2.

Jamieson, K.H., 2020. Cyberwar: how Russian hackers and trolls helped elect a president: what we don't, can't, and do know. Oxford University Press.

Ji-Young, K., In, L.J. and Gon, K.K., 2019. The All-Purpose Sword: North Korea's Cyber Operations and Strategies. In, 2019 11th International Conference on Cyber Conflict (CyCon), 900.

Kaplan, F., 2017. Dark Territory: The Secret History of Cyber War. Simon & Schuster.

Krekel, B.A., Bakos, G. and Barnett, C., 2009. Capability of the People's Republic of China to conduct cyber warfare and computer network exploitation. Northrop Grumman Corporation, Information Systems Sector.

Kshetri, N., 2014. Cyberwarfare in the Korean Peninsula: asymmetries and strategic responses. East Asia, 31.

Lakomy, M., 2013. Cyberwojna - ujęcia definicyjne. Stosunki Międzynarodowe - International Relations, 48:2.

Liedel, K. and Piasecka, P., 2011. Wojna cybernetyczna – wyzwanie XXI wieku. Bezpieczeństwo Narodowe, 1:17.

Maness, R.C., Valeriano, B., Hedgecock, K., Macias, J.M. and Jensen, B., 2023. Expanding the Dyadic Cyber Incident and Campaign Dataset (DCID). The Cyber Defense Review, 8:2.

Maréchal, N., 2017. Networked authoritarianism and the geopolitics of information: Understanding Russian Internet policy. Media and communication, 5:1.

Martins, R.P., 2018. Punching above their digital weight: Why Iran is developing cyberwarfare capabilities far beyond expectations. International Journal of Cyber Warfare and Terrorism (IJCWT), 8:2.

Perlroth, N., 2021. This Is How They Tell Me the World Ends: The Cyberweapons Arms Race. Bloomsbury Publishing.

Rattray, G.J., 2004. Wojna strategiczna w cyberprzestrzeni. Wydawnictwo WNT.

Rid, T., 2011, Cyber War Will Not Take Place, Journal of Strategic Studies. 35:1

Robinson, M., Jones, K. and Janicke, H., 2015. Cyber warfare: Issues and challenges. Computers & Security, 49.

Sayler, K.M., 2020. Artificial Intelligence and National Security, CRS reports.

Schmitt, M.N., ed., [2013] 2017. Tallinn Manual on the International Law Applicable to Cyber Warfare, Cambridge University Press.

Shakarian, P., 2011. Stuxnet: Cyberwar revolution in military affairs.

Shaw, I. G., 2017. Robot Wars: US Empire and geopolitics in the robotic age. Security Dialogue, 48:5.

Sienkiewicz, P., Świeboda, H., 2010. Analiza systemowa bezpieczeństwa cyberprzestrzeni państwa. Studia i Materiały Polskiego Stowarzyszenia Zarządzania Wiedzą, 33.

Singer, P. W. and Friedman, A., 2014. Cybersecurity and Cyberwar: What Everyone Needs to Know, Oxford University Press India.

Van Wie Davis, E., 2021. Shadow Warfare: Cyberwar Policy in the United States, Russia and China. Rowman & Littlefield Publishers.

Ventre, D., ed., 2012. Cyberwar and Information Warfare. Wiley.

Whyte, C., 2016. Ending cyber coercion: Computer network attack, exploitation and the case of North Korea. Comparative strategy, 35:2.

Whyte, Ch. and Mazanec, B., 2019. Understanding Cyber-Warfare. Taylor & Francis.

Wojnowski, M., 2019. Wybory prezydenckie jako narzędzie destabilizacji państw w teorii i praktyce rosyjskich operacji informacyjno-psychologicznych w XX i XXI wieku. Przegląd Bezpieczeństwa Wewnętrznego, 21.

Disaster Management in Authoritarian Regimes

Sometimes it takes a natural disaster to reveal a social disaster.
– Jim Wallis

Autocratic regimes are notorious for having a higher casualty rate during and in the aftermath of natural disasters. As the quote by Jim Wallis shows, this is no mere coincidence but can be explained by the workings and dysfunctionalities in authoritarian regimes, which lead to failures in prevention, preparation, and response; lack of infrastructure and resources; unwillingness to accept foreign relief aid; as well as erratic regulatory frames, information campaigns and deflecting news coverage.

DEFINITION Disaster management is the process of managing the impact of disasters for loss of life, injury and economic damage. This is accomplished by both the preparation that needs to take place before a natural hazard hits and the response to a natural hazard that collides with a population. By natural hazards, we are referring to earthquakes, floods, hurricanes, cyclones, typhoons, wildfires, volcanoes and mudslides.

SEE ALSO Like disease management and economic development, this entry shows the impact of systemic corruption under dictatorship and its effects after natural disasters strike, especially under personalist rule.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Authoritarian regimes do not perform well when it comes to preparing for and responding to natural hazards. This means that those who live under authoritarian rule are more likely to die or be adversely affected by a natural hazard compared to those who live in democracies.

LITERATURE The literature concurs that regime type does matter when it comes to preparing for disasters. Most hazards, with the exception of earthquakes, can be predicted, and there is much that the state can do to prepare in the event of any type of disaster. Preventing high casualties from natural hazards requires high levels of state capacity and a will to invest in the planning and preparations needed, and to respond with relief adequately.

A number of scholars have argued that democracies are far better than autocracies in preventing high casualties from disasters due mostly to a greater incentive to do so (Kahn 2005; Flores & Smith 2010; 2013). In a study of 4,300 natural hazards across 57 countries, it was found that countries that are more democratic and more economically equal face much lower death tolls from natural hazards comparatively speaking (Kahn 2005). A 2011 study finds that democracies are better prepared to deal with earthquakes and have lower mortality rates than autocracies (Keefer et al. 2011), while another study found that democratic governments are generally more responsive and are more likely to be prepared (Cohen & Werker 2008). Further research found that democracies were more likely to invest in sea-level stations that would offer protection from ocean disasters. Authoritarian regimes only do the same if the capital city is close to the coast and could expose members of his ruling coalition to a hazard (Flores 2018).

There may also be a positive impact when countries democratize, as countries that previously were authoritarian are better able to prevent mass casualties after democratization. Earthquakes in Peru and Mexico have also been more devastating during autocratic rule than democratic rule (Flores & Smith 2010; 2013). Four decades ago, a 7.9-magnitude quake struck Peru, killing about 66,000 people. In 2001, an even stronger earthquake hit but killed fewer than 150 people. The difference was that in 2001, Peru was a democracy, whereas in 1970, it was not. An earthquake of 7.1 magnitude that hit Mexico City in 2017 led to 370 deaths instead of thousands.

Past research in this area has noted that political survival lies at the heart of disaster politics (Flores & Smith 2010; 2013). Autocracies lack institutionalized mechanisms in place to punish ineffective governments that do not respond well to natural disasters. In contrast, democracies are driven to provide relief and invest in prevention to help their chances of being re-elected (Bechtel & Hainmueller 2011; Chen 2013; Garrett & Sobel 2003; Reeves 2011; Sylves & Buzas 2007). Autocracies may have to face uprisings, revolutions or violent coups, but the odds are that the public may do nothing. Take the case of Cyclone Nargis, which hit Myanmar in 2008. The death toll was over 138,000, making it the sixth deadliest cyclone of all time. Not only did the repressive military regime do virtually nothing to help the communities worst affected it also blocked the arrival of international aid. Afterward, survivors were prevented from seeking assistance in larger towns and villages. Within a week of the disaster, the army started forcibly dispersing survivors from makeshift camps, schools and monasteries. No information on cyclone shelters in Myanmar was published, and there were delays in accessing people because the international community was not allowed to access the most affected areas. By letting people die in outlying areas, the government forestalled the possibility of protest. Ironically, the disastrous performance of the government in handling the crisis set off some initial steps toward the political liberalization of the regime.

The poorest classes in dictatorships are also the most vulnerable to loss of life when natural hazards strike. In contrast, all citizens living in democratic states can put pressure on their governments to ensure that they are safe, and governments, in turn, must adhere to these demands or risk being voted out of power. Citizens can, therefore demand that safety standards are enforced and precautionary measures are in place if they live in areas that are prone to natural disasters (Toya & Skidmore 2007).

Authoritarian regimes do not perform as well when it comes to reducing the impact of disasters on human suffering because they do not offer freedom of speech, press or participation. The free flow of information is critical to ensuring that people know that a disaster is coming and what to do about it. The press can also play an important role in communicating valuable information about how a disaster is unfolding and where people can go to safety. If the press is muzzled or forced to be non-transparent about the situation, this can cause further casualties. After a disaster takes place, if there are missteps by the government, a free press and a vibrant civil society can pressure the government to make important changes to be better prepared.

Studies have also demonstrated that the quality of institutions also matters in determining disaster risk (Anbarci et al. 2005; Escaleras et al. 2007; Kahn 2005; Raschky 2008). Autocracies are more prone to corruption (Nur-tegin & Czap 2012), which can exacerbate death counts by incentivizing officials not to enforce building codes, infrastructure standards, or zoning requirements (Kahn 2005: 25-26). In a study looking at 334 earthquakes in 42 countries, it was found that public sector corruption is associated with greater fatalities (Escaleras et al. 2007). Corruption can also serve as a barrier to effective disaster assistance because corrupt governments are less likely to efficiently and fairly distribute pay-outs. Authoritarian leaders may use disasters to pilfer national accounts or humanitarian aid packages or privilege trusted supporters with private funds. In Nicaragua, after the earthquake in 1972 that killed between 3,000 and 7,000 people, injured approximately 15,000, and displaced 300,000 people, the government engaged in kleptocratic behavior. Instead of helping the victims, dictator Anastasio Somoza Debayle stole the foreign aid and tried to declare emergency powers.

Authoritarian regimes may also mismanage the aid that is given to them. Political leaders may use the relief checks to distribute only to their political supporters and family members. Firms that are loyal to the regime may benefit from lucrative reconstruction projects (Pelling 2003). A study in Pakistan demonstrated that relief aid was distributed only to supporters of the regime in power after the floods of 2001 (Mustafa 2003). Authoritarian regimes may also be more likely to reject international aid, particularly if it comes from democracies.

Disasters in politically sensitive areas such as the capital may threaten autocrats, but high-casualty events in remote areas may not. In 2008, an earthquake that hit Sichuan in China was taken seriously, with the government offering relief operations that garnered the approval of the international community. In contrast, a 2010 earthquake that hit the remote province of Qinghai was mostly ignored by the government, with few repercussions for the government's inaction (Wei et al. 2013).

Nevertheless, within democracies, there can also be variations in the response to disasters. In the US, the president has unilateral control over the declaration of disasters. This allows the president to offer more support to states that are strategically important to his political party. Governments may spend less on politically weak or hostile regions, as has been shown in the US (Garret & Sobel 2003; Cohen & Werker 2008). A study looking at India showed that state governments were only responsive to people who lived in areas that had better access to information and electoral accountability (Besley & Burgess 2002). Thus, some authors argue that democratic institutions are not sufficient for securing protection from disasters if there is corruption, poor planning and administrative incompetence. Persson and Povitkina (2017) argue that democracies are only able to shield their citizens from casualties when the institutional quality is high. In democracies with weak institutional quality, more people could suffer than in democracies. Another study concurs that institutions are important – empirical work from 1984 to 2004 showed that countries with better institutions experience fewer human casualties and lower economic losses from disasters (Raschky 2008).

Some studies have also looked at the impact of disasters on a state's propensity to use repression. Hannah Arendt argued that violence often emerges when power is threatened, and disasters are the type of crisis that might make the state feel threatened. State capacity may decline after a massive disaster takes place, and severe disasters may impede the regime's ability to communicate and coordinate security (Le Billon & Waizenegger 2007). A regime's failure to properly respond to a disaster has the potential to lead to unrest. Furthermore, if aid flows to assist with the recovery process are not dispersed appropriately and used by the regime for their own personal enrichment, this can be another source of tension. After the earthquake in 1992 in Cairo led to 500 deaths, 10,000 injuries and 40,000 people were homeless, the government was slow and cumbersome in its response. As a result, Islamic organizations stepped in to provide support, but this was met with a harsh crackdown for months, with hundreds detained (Singerman 2002; Wood & Wright 2016). Other research has argued that when a regime fails to respond to disasters properly this could also raise the propensity for a coup (Carlin et al. 2014).

Others argue that the chances for dissent are low in authoritarian regimes post-disaster, and it is democracies that are more likely to be destabilized (Flores & Smith 2013). Citizens living under authoritarian rule are less likely to protest and voice their dissent as they assume that protests will be quickly repressed (Flores & Smith 2013). Autocracies can even prevent their citizens from mobilizing by closing down public sites or enforcing a curfew. Further research argues that it is both democracies and autocracies that may use repression after a disaster hits, but democracies are much less likely to do so when they receive foreign aid (Wood & Wright 2016).

EXAMPLES One of the most notable examples of authoritarian mismanagement when it comes to disaster is the 7.0 earthquake that hit Haiti in January 2010, which killed 222,000 people. Haiti has suffered from decades of personalist rule and corruption and has teetered on state failure. Without strong institutions and civil society to ensure that safeguards for disaster mitigation are in place, the government failed to prepare for pending disasters. In comparison, the next month, an 8.0 earthquake that was 500 times stronger hit Chile but killed only 500 people. In the case of Chile, stricter building codes and quick reaction from the government to coordinate international and domestic relief efforts were critical. Haiti, in contrast, has no national building code, a disregard for permits, and few earthquake engineers to help advise. The government was accused of stealing foreign aid rather than dispensing it (Smith & Flores 2015). Further disaster hit Haiti because it is one of the most deforested countries in the world, making it more prone to mudslides after an earthquake, putting much of its population at risk. There are also, of course, huge differences in wealth between Haiti and Chile. However, there are other examples from states that have more similar levels of poverty. In South Asia, the earthquake in 2001 that hit democratic India killed 20,000 people. In contrast, the 2005 smaller earthquake that hit authoritarian Pakistan killed more than 80,000 people.

Other examples demonstrate the benefits of democratization. In 1906 and 1985, massive earthquakes hit San Francisco, CA and Mexico City, Mexico, respectively. Though their GDP per capita was similar, as was the size of the earthquake, the one in Mexico killed three times as many people, with 45,000 deaths. When other earthquakes hit Mexico in 2017 after it had allowed for turnover in power, the results of preparation led to different outcomes. One of the strongest earthquakes ever recorded hit Oaxaca at 8.2 on the Richter scale and led to 98 deaths. Another 7.1 earthquake hit Mexico City that same year and led to 370 deaths.

IMPACT ON POLICY The collision of a natural hazard and vulnerabilities leads to natural disasters. Governments, NGOs and international organizations have worked hard to emphasize what states need to do to be more prepared. As part of the major disaster relief frameworks and protocols, improving good governance, transparency, and the rule of law has been repeatedly highlighted as critical to making important inroads in mitigating disaster risk.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Disaster Management in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Anbarci, N., Escaleras, M. and Register, C.A., 2005. Earthquake fatalities: the interaction of nature and political economy. Journal of Public Economics, 89:9-10.

Bechtel, M.M. and Hainmueller, J., 2011. How lasting is voter gratitude? An analysis of the short-and long-term electoral returns to beneficial policy. American Journal of Political Science, 55:4.

Besley, T. and Burgess, R., 2002. The political economy of government responsiveness: Theory and evidence from India. The Quarterly Journal of Economics, 117:4.

Carlin, R.E., Love, G.J. and Zechmeister, E.J., 2014. Trust shaken: Earthquake damage, state capacity, and interpersonal trust in comparative perspective. Comparative Politics, 46:4.

Chen, J., 2013. Voter partisanship and the effect of distributive spending on political participation. American Journal of Political Science, 57:1.

Cohen, C. and Werker, E.D., 2008. The Political Economy of 'Natural' Disasters. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 52:6.

Congleton, R.D., 2006. The story of Katrina: New Orleans and the political economy of catastrophe. Public Choice, 127:1.

Dyson, M.E. and Elliott, P., 2010. Come hell or high water: Hurricane Katrina and the color of disaster. Basic Civitas Books.

Escaleras, M., Anbarci, N. and Register, C.A., 2007. Public sector corruption and major earthquakes: A potentially deadly interaction. Public Choice, 132:1.

Flores, A.Q., 2018. Protecting people from natural disasters: political institutions and ocean-originated hazards. Political Science Research and Methods, 6:1.

Flores, A.Q. and Smith, A., 2013. Leader survival and natural disasters. British Journal of Political Science, 43:4.

Flores, A.Q. and Smith, A., 2010. Surviving disasters. Wilf Family Department of Politics, New York University.

Garrett, T.A. and Sobel, R.S., 2003. The political economy of FEMA disaster payments. Economic Inquiry, 41:3.

Kahn, M.E., 2005. The death toll from natural disasters: the role of income, geography, and institutions. Review of economics and statistics, 87:2.

Keefer, P., Neumayer, E. and Plümper, T., 2011. Earthquake propensity and the politics of mortality prevention. World Development, 39:9.

Mustafa, D., 2003. Reinforcing vulnerability? Disaster relief, recovery, and response to the 2001 flood in Rawalpindi, Pakistan. Global Environmental Change Part B: Environmental Hazards, 5:2.

Nur-Tegin, K. and Czap, H.J., 2012. Corruption: Democracy, autocracy, and political stability. Economic Analysis and Policy, 42:1.

Pelling, M., 2003. Natural disaster and development in a globalizing world. Routledge.

Persson, T.A. and Povitkina, M., 2017. "Gimme shelter": The role of democracy and institutional quality in disaster preparedness. Political Research Quarterly, 70:4.

Raschky, P.A., 2008. Institutions and the losses from natural disasters. Natural Hazards and Earth System Sciences, 8:4.

Reeves, A., 2011. Political disaster: Unilateral powers, electoral incentives, and presidential disaster declarations. The Journal of Politics, 73:4.

Singerman, D., 2002. The politics of emergency rule in Egypt. Current History, 101:651.

Sylves, R. and Búzás, Z.I., 2007. Presidential disaster declaration decisions, 1953-2003: What influences odds of approval? State and Local Government Review, 39:1.

Toya, H. and Skidmore, M., 2007. Economic development and the impacts of natural disasters. Economics Letters, 94:1.

Wei, B., Su, G. and Liu, F., 2013. Public response to earthquake disaster: a case study in Yushu Tibetan Autonomous Prefecture. Natural hazards, 69:1.

Wood, R.M. and Wright, T.M., 2016. Responding to catastrophe: Repression dynamics following rapid-onset natural disasters. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 60:8.

Disease Management in Authoritarian Regimes

So all a man could win in the conflict between plague and life was knowledge and memories.
– Albert Camus

The study of disease management is a critical area of inquiry that sheds light on the broader implications of governance systems on public health outcomes. This field examines the capacity of authoritarian regimes to effectively manage and control disease outbreaks, treatment, and prevention and contrasts it with the performance of democracies. This entry delves into the so-called 'authoritarian advantage' and scrutinizes the empirical evidence to understand whether dictatorships indeed have an edge in managing health crises, such as the COVID-19 pandemic, or if their approach to public health is detrimental.

DEFINITION Disease management refers to how well governments manage and control disease outbreaks, treatment and prevention. Though disease management might frequently refer to infectious diseases, this can also apply to non-communicable diseases. It is essentially looking at how competent the state is in ensuring that its population is healthy.

SEE ALSO In particular, this entry questions the so-called 'authoritarian advantage,' which is also covered under the entry on economic development. However, disinformation and (medical) censorship are much more pronounced under authoritarianism, and its effects can have grave consequences for disease management.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Authoritarian regimes have been vocal in touting their success at managing the COVID-19 pandemic compared to democracies. However, when looking at disease management overall, they perform much worse. Additionally, their overall advantage in managing the pandemic is mixed. The pandemic aside, the empirical evidence shows that authoritarian regimes often do not have the incentive to manage diseases properly, leading to lower life expectancy and higher maternal, child and infant mortality rates.

MEASUREMENT There are numerous ways in which disease management is measured. This can be done by looking at life expectancy, child and infant mortality rates and maternal death rates. To look at more specific diseases and how they are managed, the specific disease prevalence and death rate can also be examined, along with how this may impact different age groups. Another proxy for healthcare and disease management is to look at the percentage of the population that has access to clean water and a flush toilet. Health can also be measured by looking at the number of years of disability-adjusted life years, which is important for understanding the impact of many diseases that do not have a high mortality rate.

LITERATURE The literature on authoritarian regimes has mostly concurred that they do not perform well when it comes to managing general health outcomes. Though there are regimes that have made important inroads in disease management, on average, authoritarian regimes do not perform well on the most important markers of a healthy population – life expectancy rates, infant and child mortality rates and maternal death rates (Baum & Lake 2003; Besley & Kudamatsu 2006; Bollyky et al. 2019; Cutler et al. 2006; Ghobarah et al. 2004; Hall & Jones 2007; Kaufman & Segura-Ubiergo 2000; Lake & Baum 2001; Lin et al. 2012; Muntaner et al. 2011; Vollmer & Ziegler 2009).

In particular, several studies have argued that authoritarian regimes perform comparatively worse when it comes to life expectancy (Baum & Lake 2003; Mackenbach 2013; Mackenbach et al. 2013). Using data from 2020, if we just look at the 25 most autocratic countries in the world, the average life expectancy rate is 71.7 years of age. This compares with the global average of 73.2 years of age. In stark contrast, the top 25 democratic countries in the world have an average life expectancy of 78.88 years of age.

Scholars have theorized that poor performance may be driven by dictators not wanting to invest in their citizens for fear that a healthy population may pose a bigger threat to their rule. However other theoretical factors may assist democracies in performing better in health outcomes. According to this literature, there is (i) a representation effect, (ii) a participation effect, (iii) an accountability effect, and (iv) a selection effect (Besley & Kudamatsu 2006). We explain in further detail how this works.

Representation effect (i) While democracies have to represent the public, authoritarian regimes only need to co-opt a select group of individuals that prop up their regimes (Ezrow & Frantz 2011) – cf. selectorate theory and Box 7.1 on audience costs. The public in a democracy may push for issues like better healthcare and regulations necessary to safeguard health and safety, while autocracies don't allow for much input from the public at large. Because authoritarian leaders only need to win over a much narrower support group, this may result in worse outcomes when it comes to health, as there is little pressure to advocate on behalf of the health needs of the entire population. As such, studies reveal that they are less likely to spend and invest in healthcare (Liang & Mirelman 2014). Democracies are linked to greater access to universal healthcare even when taking into account economic recessions (Templin et al. 2021).

Participation effect (ii) Related to the previous point, authoritarian regimes do not allow the public to participate in the decision-making process. In authoritarian regimes, this process is often opaque with little transparency of how decisions are being made and little societal input. In contrast, in democracies, there is greater input from citizens and knowledgeable networks that can drive sound policy (Wigley & Akkoyunlu-Wigley 2011). Citizens in a democracy can also advocate themselves for change if it affects their health (Sen 1999).

Accountability effect (iii) There is also less accountability in authoritarian regimes, and these tend to have higher levels of corruption (Kolstad & Wiig 2016; Rock 2009). Without checks on the power of the executive, the regime can engage in corrupt behavior, abusing power at the expense of public funds. In fact, studies have shown that, on average, dictatorships are less likely to provide public goods critical to maintaining public health standards, such as access to safe water, public sanitation and pollution (Deacon 2009). Thus, instead of investing in human capital, dictators are free to siphon off the state coffers to pay for their personal affairs.

Additionally, authoritarian regimes may not allow for the free flow of information and may block valuable information coming from activists and NGOs if they feel threatened by these actors. Authoritarian regimes may have an incentive to cover up the impact of a policy that is not working, and without whistle-blowers to uncover what is taking place, it is difficult to ensure public safety. It is also less likely that leaders who are negligent when it comes to health and safety will face consequences. In contrast, failure by democracies to pay attention to health issues and make tangible improvements may affect re-election chances (Nelson 2007). For example, in China in 2008, at least six infants died, and almost 52,000 infants and young children were hospitalized with renal problems after ingesting infant formula processed with melamine, an industrial chemical (Tang et al. 2015). Complaints made in 2005 about the milk being tainted with unauthorized substances were ignored (Lim 2008). Though the government eventually recalled the products and the manufacturers were punished, tainted milk powder was still illegally resold years later

Selection effect (iv) Finally, authoritarian regimes may be more likely to select incompetent and inexperienced leaders (Besley & Reynal-Querol 2011). Most dictatorships in history have emerged as the result of a military coup, where a (high-ranking) member of the military with little political experience seizes power and rules with an iron fist with little concern about outcomes. In other instances, authoritarian leaders emerge because of hereditary conditions, which are highly variable in terms of outcomes. For military dictatorships, though the military may have some knowledge of security, military personnel are poorly equipped to make coherent policies when it comes to healthcare. They also may prioritize the bulk of their budgets on military spending rather than development spending. In Nigeria, after it came under military rule in 1983, immunization rates for children fell by 50%. After the military was ousted from power in 1973, there was a sharp increase in the rural population's access to safe water in Argentina in 1973 (Lake & Baum 2001).

Further to these mechanisms, authoritarian regimes are also associated with lower levels of access to clean water, which is critical to preventing infectious diseases and can negatively impact life expectancy (Lake & Baum 2001). For example, in Russia, there are serious problems with contaminated drinking water, and according to one study, possibly as much as 60 percent of drinking water reserves do not meet safety standards. In total, this means that safe drinking water is inaccessible to 11 million Russians (Ritter 2018). Some of this is due to Soviet-era dumping of toxic waste, which impacts Russia's water reserves, but it is also due to the fact that there is little regulation, health codes are often ignored, and little money was invested in water pollution control equipment (Peterson 2019). Democracies, in contrast, offer more citizens access to clean water because investing in these services is critical to support from the public (Besley & Kudamatsu 2006).

In spite of these conclusions, several studies have countered that there is an 'authoritarian advantage' when it comes to health outcomes (Shandra et al. 2004). The argument in favor of authoritarian regimes theorizes that autocracies do not have to deal with bureaucratic resistance, political gridlock or public resistance to an unpopular policy that may benefit public health. Authoritarian regimes may be better at mobilizing their population since they can resort to using force or threats of force, if necessary, which may enable them to successfully execute a simple public intervention (Golinowska & Sowa 2007). This might ensure that authoritarian regimes can deliver on immunization rates, which can lower infant and child mortality rates (Gauri & Khaleghian 2002; Nelson 2007). True, some authoritarian regimes have managed to ensure low under-five mortality rates, such as China at 7.9 deaths per 1,000 live births, Cuba at 5.1 deaths and Singapore with 2.5 deaths. But these are more the exception than the rule. Countries like Chad and the Central African Republic have 113.8 and 110.1 deaths, respectively. Of all of the countries that perform the worst on this indicator (looking at the bottom 25 percent), there is not one country that is a full democracy, and the same can be said for infant mortality rates.

The few studies that have examined the impact of authoritarian rule on the management of endemic diseases (almost exclusively looking at HIV/AIDS) have revealed a similar outcome. Authoritarian regimes do not manage endemic diseases well, as they are less likely to provide access to treatment to all members of society (Baum & Lake 2003; Besley & Kudamatsu 2006). Democracies, on the other hand, respond to HIV treatment as a public good, with democratic countries like Botswana and Costa Rica providing free treatment. Botswana has gone so far as to offer free treatment to non-citizens as well (Habib 2019).

Overall, authoritarian regimes perform worse when it comes to public health indicators, but as some of the aforementioned examples reveal, there is variation among dictatorships in terms of performance. For example, studies also show that just holding elections matters – as electoral autocracies or authoritarian regimes that hold multi-party elections perform better when it comes to disease outcomes (Miller 2015).

Adding to the debate on authoritarian regimes and health outcomes, some studies have demonstrated that the type of authoritarian regime matters – and that countries led by single-party regimes may have an advantage when it comes to lower infant mortality rates compared to military regimes and monarchies (McGuire 2013). Life expectancy in Hong Kong is the highest in the world at 85.29 years of age, edging out democratic Japan at 85.03. Life expectancy in Singapore (84.07) is higher than in Iceland (83.52). China has also greatly improved life expectancy levels to 77.47 years, up from 44 years in 1960. Cuba has also improved its life expectancy levels from 57.63 in 1950, 63.55 in 1960, to 78.98 today. Haiti, suffered through decades of personalist rule and still registers a life expectancy today (64.4) that is only slightly better than Cuba's was in 1960.

Much of the success could be attributed to the role of single-party regimes that are focused on achieving objectives that require a robust and healthy public. For example, in order to ensure that labor remained productive, communist countries worked to provide basic sanitation and universal health coverage for their citizens. In line with this argument, one study argued that autocracies have done well in countering infectious diseases that threaten people when they are at their most productive age while more likely to ignore health threats that affect older populations (Rosenberg & Shvetsova 2016). They may be also more likely to tackle diseases that affect urban populations. Thus, in contrast to the argument that autocrats have no interest in promoting human development, concern for productivity may have caused single-party regimes to invest in improving health outcomes (McGuire 2013).

Personalist rule may be the worst when it comes to disease management – as they have the shortest time horizons (see Box 5.5) due to an absence of institutionalized mechanisms for turnover in power. A dictator who constantly lives in fear of ouster by both the public and other elites is less likely to invest in healthcare spending to address long-term health problems or invest in human capital (Yan & Lin 2020; Dionne 2011). Personalist dictators may surround themselves and fill government offices with people who have no experience or expertise to handle public health challenges (Ezrow & Frantz 2011). Per-sonalist regimes are free to make decisions at their whim, since there is no one surrounding the dictator who can either challenge the dictator or wants to. Without any challengers, the personalist leader is also free to siphon off funds that could go toward healthcare and disease prevention into their own pockets.

The personalist dictator also creates an environment that fosters false reporting and politically managing facts. If the truth is inconvenient, the regime will look the other way (Egorov & Sonin 2011; Frantz & Ezrow 2009). Personalist rule is also highly unpredictable (see Frantz & Ezrow 2009), repressive and vindictive, which has been cited as a push factor that has led to an exodus of trained health personnel (Chojnicki & Oden-Defoort 2010). In the case of Equatorial Guinea, by the time personalist dictator Francisco Macías Nguema was deposed (1968-1979), there was not a single university graduate remaining in the country (Decalo 2019). As a result of all of these factors, personalist regimes are erratic and tend to perform poorly on almost all health indicators (Frantz & Ezrow 2011). Though some resource-rich personalist dictatorships may invest somewhat in human capital, the results do not match their assets (Kendall-Taylor et al. 2019).

For example, the Democratic Republic of Congo (formerly Zaire) was run for many years by personalist dictators Joseph Mobutu (1965-1997, Box 1.7), followed by Laurent-Désiré Kabila (1997-2001), followed by Kabila's son Joseph (2001-2019). In spite of being a resource-rich country, after several decades of personalist rule, health financing became non-existent, with the country dependent on both out-of-pocket payments and humanitarian aid (McFerson 2009; WHO 2015). This led to fragmentation, waste and duplication of the health sector and a complete lack of management and regulation. Due to poor funding and planning, capacity remains incredibly uneven. In one district, for example, the capacity was developed to test for HIV/AIDS but not to deliver treatment. Another issue is that health funding is used for personal gain. Medical equipment and supplies were purchased by the central government, with the deliveries coinciding with the first round of presidential elections in 2008 to boost the popularity of the incumbent regime. The supplies were then given to parliamentarians, who were tasked with delivering them to their constituencies, but there was no oversight of this process. Some supplies never arrived while some equipment was delivered without qualified staff to operate it (WHO 2015).

In Venezuela, which had once been a middle-income country, years of personalist rule (first by Hugo Chávez starting with his turn to dictatorship in 2005 and followed by Nicolás Maduro, who cemented his position after Chávez died in 2013) plunged the country into chaos and poverty. Though initially, some progress in health outcomes took place under Chávez, corruption and the drop in oil prices led to the collapse of the health system and the resurgence of preventable diseases (Paniz-Mondolfi et al. 2019). After Maduro took over, things deteriorated further, and diseases like malaria were surging again. By 2019, Venezuela saw a 1200 percent increase in malaria cases since 2000, with nearly half a million cases per year, and accounted for three percent of the malaria deaths in South America (Gabaldón-Figueira et al. 2021). The last official report from the Ministry of Health was in 2016, and after releasing it Health Minister Antonieta Corporale was immediately fired. True, turnover was high for this position, with Venezuela having 17 different health ministers in 20 years, but Corporale was sacked because the report revealed that there had been a 65 and 30 percent increase in maternal and infant mortality rates, respectively (The Lancet 2018). The country refuses to release any other health or epidemiological data. The country has also experienced a massive exodus of biomedical scientists and qualified healthcare professionals (Garcia Zea 2020).

Politically managing the numbers and hiding disease outbreaks can happen in single-party regimes as well (as the case study of China will illustrate), but these regimes usually have more potential whistle-blowers who are willing to come forward. Single-party regimes are also more capable of handling health challenges because they tend to invest in health in order to achieve their programmatic outcomes of economic growth and economic expansion.

Personalist rule usually has very little incentive to address any infectious diseases adequately, but there are exceptions. Paul Kagame (a personalist leader) of Rwanda has invested in the overall healthcare of Rwandans and has won accolades from the international community for his commitment to infectious disease control (Iyer et al. 2018; Frantz et al. 2021). Yoweri Museveni (another personalist leader) of Uganda has also worked hard to target the AIDS crisis with some success (Allen & Heald 2004). But for every Museveni and Kagame, there are many others (like ex-presidents Idriss Déby of Chad, Blaise Compaoré of Burkina Faso and current president Paul Biya of Cameroon) who have allowed infectious diseases to run rampant with little investment or prevention measures in place to address them.

In addition to personalist rule driving poor health outcomes, resource-rich countries may also underperform – in spite of having the revenues available to tackle health challenges. One of the few studies looking at the relationship between regime type and malaria demonstrated that dictatorships that are rich in resources perform the worst in controlling and treating malaria compared to resource-rich democracies (Chang 2020) – cf. resource curse. Resource-rich countries tend to establish patronage politics where resource rents are delivered to supporters, but no public goods are offered (Robinson et al. 2006). Studies have also shown that resource-rich countries have higher infant and child mortality rates (Makhlouf et al. 2017) and lower life expectancy (Pendergast et al. 2011).

We can also see a general correlation between authoritarian regimes and disease management. Data available shows that countries with the highest Disease Adjusted Life Years (DALYs) (or the number of years that have been lost due to poor health, disability or early death) are authoritarian regimes in Sub Saharan Africa. The only democracies that perform poorly on this measure are South Africa with 21,500 DALY rates out of 100,000, Botswana with 17,400 and India with 13,200. This compares with the Central African Republic, which records 53,800 (Our World in Data 2017), and though every country has improved, autocracies have improved the least.

For the most part, the authoritarian advantage literature lacks robust quantitative evidence. Regardless of the variation within dictatorships, other recent works have emphasized that democracies lead to more positive health outcomes than autocracies in general. A study that looked at 170 countries from 1900-2012 found that democratic rule, measured by looking at the quality of competitive elections, has consistently had positive outcomes on a population's health, even when taking good governance into account (Wang et al. 2019). Though there are exceptions, most authoritarian regimes are unable and/or unwilling to invest, innovate, and consult their public to create robust public healthcare systems that build human capital and ensure the strongest possible health outcomes.

Democracies were accused of reacting slowly to the COVID-19 pandemic, but earlier studies are already predicting that, overall, democracies will fare better because they place a higher value on human life and health (Karabulut et al. 2021). The biggest issue, however, for authoritarian regimes combating disease with pandemic potential is medical censorship. Authoritarian regimes are more likely to engage in medical censorship that can have devastating consequences for reporting the spark of a new virus. Case in point: the Syrian government forced doctors who sounded the alarm that polio had returned to disappear (Eichner & Brockmann 2013); the doctor who had alerted the world about MERS was forced into exile by the Saudi regime (Sparrow 2021); the Chinese government punished the surgeon who dared to speak out about SARS (Dowell 2006). This medical censorship is particularly dangerous because the medical community is so critical to identifying emerging threats.

In fact, the Chinese government's attempt to cover up SARS led to the revision of the International Health Regulations (IHR), which stipulated that all countries must report any novel virus that could be of international concern. After the SARS crisis, the Chinese government spent about $100 million on setting up the largest direct reporting network system in the world. The system was supposed to allow any doctor at any level to directly report signs of a disease outbreak to the central government in real-time, but this was never implemented in practice (Farrell 2020). Despite the self-adulation, the early handling of the crisis by the regime made the crisis considerably worse.

With COVID-19, Chinese authorities also concealed that there was a problem and actively repressed the timely flow of crucial public health information (Kuo 2020). Instead, the WHO learned about COVID-19 not through Beijing but through an open-source platform for doctors to quickly disseminate information that could be frowned upon by their governments. China was asked to verify the outbreak, but instead of responding within 24 hours, the government spent time going after those spreading rumors and taking measures against lawbreakers as an intimidation tactic. By 20 January 2020, Beijing finally admitted that there was human-to-human transmission taking place but continued to manage the data only to report a fraction of the real numbers (Sparrow 2021).

Because the transmission rate appeared to be low based on the data China released, the WHO decided not to immediately declare a Public Health Emergency of International Concern (PHEIC) and informed the public that the virus was spread through large droplets that landed on surfaces rather than through airborne microdroplets. As such, regular hand washing was advocated instead of masks. Many crucial pieces of information were not communicated by the Chinese government that could have been helpful to the WHO and governments to accurately provide a response and public health advice about the dangers of the disease.

The case of China illustrates the cracks in the 'authoritarian advantage' arguments. There also is not a clear authoritarian advantage when it comes to societal acceptance of restrictions on freedom that may hurt the collective. Some democratic societies were prepared to accept restrictions on freedom and personal data. In many democracies, privacy protections were relaxed to help alert people to be tested. Lax privacy rules in South Korea allowed the state to use credit cards, CCTV, and GPS tracking data of people who have the virus to publicize the results to trace contacts anonymously. Most countries resorted to using quarantines to stem the outbreak (Morgan & Wang 2020). Though there are more authoritarian societies that are accustomed to dealing with invasions of privacy than democracies, this is not always the case. It's also not clear that authoritarian regimes are more likely to quarantine their populations. Some of the toughest COVID rules and lockdowns were in democracies like New Zealand and Australia.

Furthermore, though authoritarian regimes have more repressive tools at their disposal, they are also more likely to deal with a crisis with a cover-up and a disinformation campaign, even if it undermines their ability to respond effectively (Shih 2020). Authoritarian regimes have incentives to cover up the severity of a crisis and to politically manage the data to make themselves appear more in control. In contrast, democracies benefit from a free flow of information and transparency and can make use of all sorts of reports to respond more appropriately to danger (Sen 1994).

In contrast, in authoritarian regimes like China, government employees are used to screen and censor online content and guide online discussions, prohibiting any comments that may spur mobilization and collective action (King et al. 2013). The Chinese government has a long history of secrecy after its disastrous responses to the Great Leap Forward (where an estimated 20-50 million people died of famine). Secrecy and maintaining order come before telling the truth. In the case of SARS in China, as late as 3

April 2003, the minister of health insisted that SARS was stifling criticism of the regime and was adamant that there was nothing to be worried about (Tai & Sun 2011). Fearing retribution, the mass media in China did not even publish the WHO global alert about SARS (Zhang 2003). Beijing also tried to restrict the WHO's inspection team from accessing SARS cases (Baekkeskov & Rubin 2017).

There have also been a handful of leaders in authoritarian regimes that initially downplayed the COVID-19 crisis. Belarussian president Alexander Lukashenko called the coronavirus a 'psychosis' that can be fixed with vodka and saunas. Lukashenko appeared on national television playing ice hockey and hugging other players (Williams & Tétrault-Farber 2021). President Gurbanguly Berdymukhamedov of Turkmenistan announced that it had no cases of coronavirus in spite of its proximity to hard hit Iran. Berdymukhamedov suppressed news about the virus and banned it from being publicly discussed (Kakissis 2020). Kim Jong-Un also initially declared that there were no cases in North Korea, though the government received funds from the WHO to combat the virus and diagnostic tests from the Russian government and was one of the first countries to shut its borders (Eberstadt 2020). Pierre Nkurunziza, former president of Burundi and an outspoken COVID-denier, is suspected to have died as a result of the virus on 8 June 2020; official reports still state a 'heart attack' as the cause of death.

Authoritarian regimes are also usually more concerned with appearing competent than actually being competent. Most modern authoritarian regimes are low on skill and competence, choosing to mostly blame others when they fail to deliver on any promises. Authoritarian regimes also threaten to punish journalists, bureaucrats, healthcare workers and other whistle-blowers who might expose information that is negative for the regime. By arresting whistle-blowers, this delays a public health response (Burkle 2020).

Another issue of authoritarian regimes is that many have very low levels of trust and interpersonal trust. The governments of China and Singapore are more the exception than the rule. Many authoritarian regimes also have high levels of corruption, which fosters low levels of legitimacy in the government. While these low levels of trust don't necessarily translate into regime overthrow – there are serious implications for how these regimes perform when a disease outbreak takes place. States that have performed the best in dealing with outbreaks have high levels of trust in the government and are willing to comply with orders without the government having to resort to using force. They trust that the information that the government is providing is accurate and that obeying these orders makes sense. These societies also have a high level of interpersonal trust, which makes them more likely to engage in community-minded behavior that benefits the greater good, like Japan, South Korea and Taiwan.

In Iran, trust in the government is low which complicated its response to the COVID-19 crisis. The public was concerned about misinformation, which made it difficult to ascertain what was true and what was false. In Guinea, in the case of Ebola, years of dictatorship, economic mismanagement and corruption have fostered high levels of distrust in the government. In 2009, protests ended with a massacre of more than 150 people, which further contributed to growing tensions (Field 2019). As a result of these low levels of trust, when the Ebola virus broke out in Guinea several years later, the community hid the sick, conducted funerals in secret and worked to elude any contact tracing.

EXAMPLES The Central African Republic (CAR) has experienced virtually no years of democracy. It has been run by one authoritarian regime after the other, most notably with the personalist dictator Jean-Bédel Bokassa leading the country from 1966 to 1979. Bokassa created a legacy of coups, instability and civilian massacres. Bokassa's reign was traumatic, and there were serious implications for the country's development. Bokassa stood trial accused of massacring innocent children and embezzling hundreds of millions in funds. Bokassa's former treasurer testified that Bokassa received $55,000 in funds in cash every week, using at least $170 million for personal use (Goldsmith 1987). This does not include the 20 million spent on his 1977 coronation ceremony (Wakabi 2006).

The health system barely functions due to a shortage of skilled health workers and a lack of medical supplies. Many people die of preventable diseases due to lack of access to vaccinations. While the number one cause of death is tuberculosis, for those under five, it is malaria. The dire state of the health system is not solely due to the fact that the country has faced almost a decade of conflict and instability. At the height of CAR's conflict, there were more deaths due to the lack of health services than from violence (Wohlers et al. 2015). A series of dictators have mismanaged the budget and embezzled funds. As a result, the level and availability of even basic care were non-existent (O'Toole 2019).

In Turkmenistan, one of the most repressive dictatorships, the healthcare system fell apart under the leadership of Saparmurat Niyazov. There is a general policy of secrecy and denial. In 2000, the Turkmen government stopped reporting some health indicators to the WHO. The government stopped offering information on the number of cases of HIV and tried to cover up a ban on the plague. It also issued an unofficial ban on diagnosing any infectious disease, and doctors were not permitted to mention the cause of death being a disease on death certificates.

Due to rising levels of corruption and mismanagement of funds, healthcare cuts took place in order to recover the loss of funds. Huge budget cuts caused the healthcare system to deteriorate further. In 2004, over 15,000 healthcare workers (including doctors, nurses, midwives, and medical assistants) were dismissed and replaced by unqualified military conscripts and user fees were introduced. Budget cuts also affected the procurement of essential drugs and medical supplies. After these cuts were made, some of the money saved was used to build a $12 million Ministry of Health and Medical Industry building in the shape of a snake's head. Healthcare workers who remained on the payroll were only paid sporadically, leading to an increase in requests for bribes to perform their duties. Then, in 2005, Niyazov ordered all hospitals and public libraries to be closed outside of the capital. Pushback from the international community meant that this was not fully implemented, but many hospitals and libraries did face closures (Rechel & McKee 2007).

There is also a lack of health professionals who have access to proper information on healthcare. There are not enough training materials, and most of the medical knowledge is out of date. The country is isolated and dependent on texts in the Turkmen language. Healthcare professionals are not able to take part in international conferences (Rechel & McKee 2007). Life expectancy is supposedly 68 years of age now – though international organizations believe it may be considerably lower. (In comparison, Georgia, which has experienced more years of democratic governance, has a life expectancy of 73.) It is also very difficult to gain access to accurate data on the cause of death in Turkmenistan.

IMPACT ON POLICY The policy community has not necessarily tied political liberalization with health assistance and support. Rwanda and Uganda have both gained much positive attention for the positive roles that they have played in managing diseases in general in the case of Rwanda and regarding the AIDS crisis in the case of Uganda. Both Rwanda and Uganda are led by personalist dictators – Paul Kagame and Yoweri Museveni, respectively. Yet, both leaders have been the darlings of the foreign aid community by setting up healthcare plans that have had some initial success. In Rwanda's case, that success seems to have longevity. Rwanda offers universal healthcare through an inexpensive health insurance system, which covers 91 percent of the population (WHO 2019b). Since August 2021, it has established 1,179 health posts that provide basic health services to communities where healthcare had not been accessible in the past (WHO 2022). The Rwandan government has prioritized training and provision of local healthcare. This investment in healthcare has meant that 80 percent of those requiring malaria treatment are able to receive it, and childhood vaccination rates have increased to 95 percent (WHO 2019a). Rwanda continues to make improvements to what it offers its citizens in the areas of health, in spite of the fact that Rwanda is a dictatorship.

On the other hand, Uganda was also heralded as a big success story in the fight against HIV/AIDS. However, more carefully collected data indicated that the fight against HIV/AIDS has hit major challenges. Data from outside studies showed that HIV prevalence was actually increasing, and essentially, Uganda's success had been exaggerated due to questionable data (Parkhurst 2002). Though Museveni prioritized the fight against AIDS and, by doing so, gained tremendous financial support from foreign aid, the strategy did not address some of the root causes of the spread of infection. The other issue is that the Museveni government has little commitment to human rights and has a hardline approach toward homosexuality, which is outlawed and has fueled the spread of HIV.

Uganda's issues with fighting the disease have not impacted the amount of foreign aid that it has received, however. Generally, the policy community has aimed to not use authoritarianism as a reason for withholding important health related aid to states who are willing and cooperative partners.

NEW FRONTIERS The pandemic generated much interest in studying the intersection between infectious diseases and politics. There will be more studies that will evaluate how regime type influenced the response to the pandemic and the response to infectious diseases more generally.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Disease Management in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Allen, T. and Heald, S., 2004. HIV/AIDS policy in Africa: what has worked in Uganda and what has failed in Botswana? Journal of International Development: The Journal of the Development Studies Association, 16:8.

Baekkeskov, E. and Rubin, O., 2017. Information dilemmas and blame-avoidance strategies: From secrecy to lightning rods in Chinese health crises. Governance, 30:3.

Baum, M.A. and Lake, D.A., 2003. The political economy of growth: democracy and human capital. American Journal of Political Science, 47:2.

Besley, T. and Kudamatsu, M., 2006. Health and democracy. American Economic Review, 96:2.

Besley, T. and Reynal-Querol, M., 2011. Do democracies select more educated leaders? American Political Science Review.

Bollyky, T.J., Templin, T., Cohen, M., Schoder, D., Dieleman, J.L. and Wigley, S., 2019. The relationships between democratic experience, adult health, and cause-specific mortality in 170 countries between 1980 and 2016: an observational analysis. The Lancet, 393:10181.

Burkle, F.M., 2020. Declining public health protections within autocratic regimes: impact on global public health security, infectious disease outbreaks, epidemics, and pandemics. Prehospital and Disaster Medicine, 35:3.

Cepaluni, G., Dorsch, M. and Branyiczki, R., 2020. Political Regimes and Deaths in the Early Stages of the COVID-19 Pandemic. SSRN working paper, 3586767.

Chang, W.Y., 2020. Democracy, Natural Resources, and Infectious Diseases: the Case of Malaria, 1990-2016. Studies in Comparative International Development.

Chojnicki, X. and Oden-Defoort, C., 2010. Is there a medical brain drain? International Economics, 124.

Cockx, L. and Francken, N., 2014. Extending the concept of the resource curse: Natural resources and public spending on health. Ecological Economics, 108.

Cutler, D.M., Rosen, A.B. and Vijan, S., 2006. The value of medical spending in the United States, 1960-2000. New England journal of medicine, 355:9.

Decalo, S., 1985. African personal dictatorships. The Journal of Modern African Studies, 23:2.

Decalo, S., 2019. Psychoses of power: African personal dictatorships. Routledge.

Dionne, K.Y., 2011. The role of executive time horizons in state response to AIDS in Africa. Comparative Political Studies, 44:1.

Dowell, W.T., 2006. The internet, censorship, and China. Georgetown Journal of International Affairs, 7.

Eberstadt, N., 2020. What is the Coronavirus Doing to North Korea? New York Times.

Egorov, G. and Sonin, K., 2011. Dictators and their viziers: Endogenizing the loyalty–competence trade-off. Journal of the European Economic Association, 9:5.

Eichner, M. and Brockmann, S.O., 2013. Polio emergence in Syria and Israel endangers Europe. Lancet, 382:9907.

Ezrow, N.M. and Frantz, E., 2011. Dictators and dictatorships: Understanding authoritarian regimes and their leaders. Bloomsbury Publishing.

Farrell, M., 2020. The Role of the Chinese Communist Party in the COVID-19 Crisis. Modern China Studies, 27:2.

Field, S., 2019. Trust dynamics and Ebola treatment in Sierra Leone, Liberia, Guinea, and the Democratic Republic of the Congo, Master dissertation, University of Malta and the George Mason University's School for Conflict Analysis and Resolution.

Frantz, E. and Ezrow, N.M., 2009. 'Yes Men' and the Likelihood of Foreign Policy Mistakes across Dictatorships. In APSA, 2009 Toronto Meeting Paper.

Frantz, E. and Ezrow, N.M., 2011. The politics of dictatorship: Institutions and outcomes in authoritarian regimes. Lynne Rienner Publishers.

Frantz, E., Kendall-Taylor, A., Nietsche, C. and Wright, J., 2021. How personalist politics is changing democracies. Journal of Democracy, 32.

Gabaldón-Figueira, J.C., Villegas, L., Grillet, M.E., Lezaun, J., Pocaterra, L., Bevilacqua, M., Paniz-Mondolfi, A., González, O.N. and Chaccour, C., 2021. Malaria in Venezuela: Gabaldón's legacy scattered to the winds. The Lancet Global Health, 9:5.

Garcia Zea, D., 2020. Brain drain in Venezuela: the scope of the human capital crisis. Human Resource Development International, 23:2.

Gauri, V. and Khaleghian, P., 2002. Immunization in developing countries: its political and organizational determinants. The World Bank.

Ghobarah, H.A., Huth, P. and Russett, B., 2004. Comparative public health: The political economy of human misery and well-being. International Studies Quarterly, 48:1.

Goldsmith, M., 1987. Trial of Former Emperor Bokassa. AP.

Golinowska, S. and Sowa, A., 2007. Investing in health institutions in transition countries. CASE Network Studies and Analysis, 348.

Green, A., 2012. The Central African Republic's silent health crisis. The Lancet, 380:9846.

Greer, S.L., King, E.J., da Fonseca, E.M. and Peralta-Santos, A., 2020. The comparative politics of COVID-19: The need to understand government responses. Global Public Health.

Habib, J., 2019. Botswana Is Offering Free HIV Treatment to Non-Citizens Too in Major Policy Shift. Global Citizen.

Hall, R.E. and Jones, C.I., 2007. The value of life and the rise in health spending. The Quarterly Journal of Economics, 122:1.

Iyer, H.S., Chukwuma, A., Mugunga, J.C., Manzi, A., Ndayizigiye, M. and Anand, S., 2018. A comparison of health achievements in Rwanda and Burundi. Health and Human Rights, 20:1.

Kakissis, J., 2020. Turkmenistan Has Banned Use of the Word 'Coronavirus.' National Public Radio.

Karabulut, G., Zimmermann, K.F., Bilgin, M.H. and Doker, A.C., 2021. Democracy and COVID-19 outcomes. Economics Letters, 203.

Kaufman, R.R. and Segura-Ubiergo, A., 2000. Globalization, domestic politics, and social spending in Latin America: A time-series cross-section analysis, 1973-97. World Politics, 53.

Kendall-Taylor, A., Lindstaedt, N. and Frantz, E., 2019. Democracies and Authoritarian Regimes. Oxford University Press.

King, G., Pan, J. and Roberts, M.E., 2013. How censorship in China allows government criticism but silences collective expression. American Political Science Review.

Kleinfeld, R., 2020. Do Authoritarian or Democratic Countries Handle Pandemics Better? The Carnegie Foundation.

Kolstad, I. and Wiig, A., 2016. Does democracy reduce corruption? Democratization, 23:7.

Kuo, L., 2020. Coronavirus: Wuhan doctor speaks out against authorities. The Guardian.

Lake, D.A. and Baum, M.A., 2001. The invisible hand of democracy: political control and the provision of public services. Comparative Political Studies, 34:6.

Liang, L.L. and Mirelman, A.J., 2014. Why do some countries spend more for health? An assessment of sociopolitical determinants and international aid for government health expenditures. Social Science & Medicine, 114.

Lim, L., 2008. Chinese Milk Worker: Complaints Ignored for Years. National Public Radio.

Lin, R.T., Chen, Y.M., Chien, L.C. and Chan, C.C., 2012. Political and social determinants of life expectancy in less developed countries: a longitudinal study. BMC Public Health, 12:1.

Mackenbach, J.P., 2013. Political conditions and life expectancy in Europe, 1900-2008. Social Science & Medicine, 82.

Mackenbach, J.P., Hu, Y. and Looman, C.W., 2013. Democratization and life expectancy in Europe, 1960-2008. Social Science & Medicine, 93.

Makhlouf, Y., Kellard, N.M. and Vinogradov, D., 2017. Child mortality, commodity price volatility and the resource curse. Social Science & Medicine, 178.

McFerson, H.M., 2009. Governance and hyper-corruption in resource-rich African countries. Third World Quarterly, 30:8.

McGuire, J.W., 2013. Political regime and social performance. Contemporary Politics, 19:1.

Miller, M.K., 2015. Electoral authoritarianism and human development. Comparative Political Studies, 48:12.

Morgan, C. and Wang, A., 2020. Why South Korea's coronavirus curve looks so different from the United States. Business Insider.

Muntaner, C., Borrell, C., Ng, E., Chung, H., Espelt, A., Rodriguez-Sanz, M., Benach, J. and O'Campo, P., 2011. Politics, welfare regimes, and population health: controversies and evidence. Sociology of Health & Illness, 33:6.

Navia, P. and Zweifel, T.D., 2003. Democracy, dictatorship, and infant mortality revisited. Journal of Democracy, 14:3.

Nelson, J.M., 2007. Elections, democracy, and social services. Studies in Comparative International Development, 41:4.

O'Toole, T.E., 2019. The Central African Republic: the Continent's hidden heart. Routledge.

Our World in Data, 2017. Disease Burden.

Paniz-Mondolfi, A.E., Tami, A., Grillet, M.E., Márquez, M., Hernández-Villena, J., Escalona-Rodríguez, M.A., Blohm, G.M., Mejías, I., Urbina-Medina, H., Rísquez, A. and Castro, J., 2019. Resurgence of vaccine-preventable diseases in Venezuela as a regional public health threat in the Americas. Emerging Infectious Diseases, 25:4.

Parkhurst, J.O., 2002. The Ugandan success story? Evidence and claims of HIV-1 prevention. The Lancet, 360:9326.

Pendergast, S.M., Clarke, J.A. and Van Kooten, G.C., 2011. Corruption, development and the curse of natural resources. Canadian Journal of Political Science/Revue canadienne de science politique, 44:2.

Rechel, B. and McKee, M., 2007. The effects of dictatorship on health: the case of Turkmenistan. BMC Medicine, 5:1.

Ritter, K., 2018. Pollutants and Heavy Metals Taint Moscow's Water Supply. Circle of Blue.

Robinson, J.A., Torvik, R. and Verdier, T., 2006. Political foundations of the resource curse. Journal of Development Economics, 79:2.

Rock, M.T., 2009. Corruption and democracy. The Journal of Development Studies, 45:1.

Rosenberg, D. and Shvetsova, O., 2016. Autocratic health versus democratic health: Different outcome variables for health as a factor versus health as a right. In The Political Economy of Social Choices. Springer.

Sen, A. K., 1994. Liberty and poverty: Political rights and economics. New Republic, 210:10.

Sen, A.K., 1999. Democracy as a universal value. Journal of Democracy, 10:3.

Shandra, J.M., Nobles, J., London, B. and Williamson, J.B., 2004. Dependency, democracy, and infant mortality: a quantitative, cross-national analysis of less developed countries. Social Science & Medicine, 59:2.

Shih, V.C., 2020. Economic Shocks and Authoritarian Stability: Duration, Financial Control, and Institutions. University of Michigan Press.
Sparrow, A., 2021. The Chinese Government's Cover-up Killed Health Care Workers Worldwide. Foreign Policy.
Tai, Z. and Sun, T., 2011. The rumouring of SARS during the 2003 epidemic in China. Sociology of Health & Illness, 33:5.
Tang, L., Binns, C.W. and Lee, A.H., 2015. Infant formula crisis in China: a cohort study in Sichuan province. Journal of Health, Population, and Nutrition, 33:1.
Templin, T., Dieleman, J.L., Wigley, S., Mumford, J.E., Miller-Petrie, M., Kiernan, S. and Bollyky, T.J., 2021. Democracies Linked to Greater Universal Health Coverage Compared with Autocracies, Even in an Economic Recession. Health Affairs, 40:8.
The Lancet, 2018. The collapse of the Venezuelan health system, 391:10128.
Vollmer, S. and Ziegler, M., 2009. Political institutions and human development. The World Bank Policy Research Working Paper, 4818.
Wakabi, W., 2006. Health crisis worsens in Central African Republic. The Lancet, 367:9527.
Wang, Y.T., Mechkova, V. and Andersson, F., 2019. Does Democracy Enhance Health? New Empirical Evidence 1900-2012. Political Research Quarterly, 72:3.
Wigley, S. and Akkoyunlu-Wigley, A., 2011. The impact of regime type on health: does redistribution explain everything. World Politics, 63.
Williams, M. and Tétrault-Farber, G., 2021. Reuters.
Wohlers, L.D., Marchal, R., Dalby, N., Kilembe, F., Cakaj, L., Olin, N., Picco, E. and Smith, S.W., 2015. Making Sense of the Central African Republic. Zed Books Ltd.
WHO, 2015. Improving health system efficiency: Democratic Republic of the Congo: improving aid coordination in the health sector, World Health Organization. No. WHO/HIS/HGF/CaseStudy/15.4.
WHO, 2019a. The "World Malaria Report, 2019" at a glance. World Health Organization.
WHO, 2019b. Rwanda: the beacon of Universal Health Coverage in Africa. World Health Organization.
WHO, 2022. Rwanda's primary health care strategy improves access to essential and life-saving health services. World Health Organization.
World Values Survey, 2020. Wave 7.
Yan, H.T. and Lin, Y.C., 2020. How time horizons of autocrats impact health expenditure: a mixed methods research. BMC Public Health, 20:1.
Zhang, E., 2003. SARS: Unmasking Censorship in China. China Rights Forum, 3.

Economic Development in Authoritarian Regimes

Progress is impossible without change; and those who cannot change their minds cannot change anything.
– George Bernard Shaw

As defined by the UN, economic development is only one sphere of 'human development,' measured by education indicators like literacy and access to schooling and health indicators like life expectancy and infant and child mortality rates. Human development incorporates all aspects of individuals' wellbeing, ranging from health, economic status and political freedoms. Since 1987, the UN has also emphasized 'sustainable development,' or the process of meeting the needs of the present without compromising the ability of future generations to meet their own needs. This view is sensitive to unequal growth and poverty alleviation among nations as well as to the planet's environment and ecology to support long-term growth.

DEFINITION Economic development consists of the process by which a country grows and modernizes its economy and improves the wellbeing of its citizens.

SEE ALSO While this entry narrows its scope to economic development under authoritarianism, other spheres of human development can be found under disease management, disaster management and gender equality.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Whether or not authoritarian regimes are better at generating economic growth and development continues to be debated. Also known as the 'authoritarian advantage,' autocracies were supposedly better equipped to get the most out of their citizens and could rapidly industrialize and grow. Much of the debate was framed in terms of how to promote high rates of investment (Bhagwati 2002). New democracies were vulnerable to demands for immediate consumption, which would lead to a decline in savings and investment. However, studies have not fully supported this assumption. While some autocracies have been able to foster growth, many have not.

LITERATURE In the post-World War II period there was a host of studies that argued that authoritarian regimes are more capable than democracies to promote growth and development. Most notably, Samuel Huntington (1968) argued that authoritarian regimes – particularly single-party regimes, were best suited for generating economic growth. Several decades later, Robert Barro (1996) produced an influential quantitative study that similarly concluded that democracy does not promote growth.

Proponents of this view argued that democracies would acquiesce to populist demands for consumption and redistribution (Haggard & Kaufman 2018; Alesina & Rodrik 1994). An unpopular incumbent politician would pursue an unstable economic policy in order to win elections (Besley & Coate 1998). Politicians would deal with shorter 'time horizons' (see Box 5.5) by enacting policies that were detrimental to economic growth (Haggard & Kaufman 2018).

Autocracies, in contrast, are insulated from the demands of the public and are free to pursue unpopular policies that stimulate growth and lead to investment (Przeworski & Limongi 1995). They also are not pressured to redistribute income to their poorer citizens and are able to withstand pressure from labor unions (Alesina & Rodrik 1994; Persson & Tabellini 1994). Authoritarian regimes can suppress labor and ensure that there are lower wages, which supposedly increases the return from capital and increases the incentive for private investment (Rodrik 1999). Autocracies also do not face policy paralysis. They are free from political gridlock that slows down the decision-making process in democratic regimes (March & Olsen 1984).

Some authors also noted the fast growth rates of South Korea, Taiwan, China, Singapore and Chile as evidence of the authoritarian advantage (see Box 7.3 on Asian Tigers). Nevertheless, in spite of these examples the empirical research on the advantage of authoritarian regimes when it comes to generating economic growth is still contested. Some scholars claim that there is no statistically significant effect (La Porta et al. 1999; Przeworski et al. 2000; Tsebelis 2002).

One reason why the authoritarian advantage may be overblown is that it is assumed that dictators are enlightened enough or externally receptive to expert advice to pursue sound policies. But most dictators lack the expertise and incentive to pursue the 'right' policies (Maravall 1994). Authoritarian regimes also do not have access to all information about how policies are working in practice because state-society relations are often not embedded. There was also a wide variance in terms of the policies that dictatorships pursued, with some implementing expert-led policies and others making gut decisions.

Thus, the type of autocracy matters. Not all countries are Singapore or China. Similar to what Huntington first argued, researchers noted that it was single-party regimes that were most likely to generate economic growth, while other forms of authoritarian rule often under-performed. Personalist rule, in particular, was the most erratic and would most likely perform poorly economically (Frantz & Ezrow 2011). Because there are no constraints on personalist dictators, they have the power to make arbitrary and badly informed decisions at their whim. This contrasts with single-party regimes, which rely upon the consultation, discussion and consensus of other elite party members, many of whom have a technocratic background to make decisions. Personalist dictators lack the guardrails to prevent kleptocratic behavior, and they are thus more likely to exploit state resources and revenues for their self-enrichment. These predatory policies have an overwhelmingly negative impact on economic growth and the most vulnerable populations.

There are many theoretical reasons why democracies would perform better than their authoritarian counterparts. Democratic processes with free and open political environments create conditions necessary to motivate citizens to work, save, and invest (Sirowy & Inkles 1990). Democratic institutions provide checks and balances to curtail the abuse of power (North 1990; Halperin et al. 2009). Institutions create stability, which helps growth because they reduce uncertainty (North 1990). Additionally, patronage networks in dictatorships stunt the independence and productivity of the private sector, reducing their growth potential. In their book Why Nations Fail: The origins of power, prosperity and poverty, J.A. Robinson and D. Acemoglu (2012) provide a comprehensive comparison between regime trajectories leading to vicious circles under exclusive institutions and virtuous circles under inclusive ones.

Democracies have the public interest at heart, and democratic publics will apply more pressure for governments to invest in human capital – such as healthcare and education, which has positive knock-on effects on economic growth (Tavares & Wacziarg 2001; Baum & Lake 2003; Barro & Sala-i-Martin 2004). Democracies are also more likely to pursue policies that benefit the general population and not just a small group of clients (Acemoglu & Robinson 2006; Bratton & van de Walle 1994).

Although authoritarian regimes are also fully capable of protecting property rights and upholding the rule of law, history shows that they are less inclined to do so. Rather than serve as sources of stability, many autocrats use institutions to hold on to power. Democracy's clear mechanisms for succession also foster continuity. Many authoritarian regimes face instability due to frequent coups or threats of conflict. There is no guarantee that an authoritarian regime ousted by a coup will see continuity from the previous regime to the next. When authoritarian regimes collapse, they are usually followed by an entirely different autocracy that may enact new policies.

Democracies allow for free and open debate which may help lead to new ideas and help maintain better transparency and accountability when policies are not working (Halperin et al. 2009). Several studies have found empirical support for the positive effect of democracy on technological change and productivity growth (Przeworski et al. 2000; North 2005; North et al. 2009). Democracies also foster conditions that are conducive to entrepreneurship and innovation (Sirowy & Inkles 1990). In contrast, hierarchical organizations may struggle to stimulate innovation.

Authoritarian regimes restrict civil liberties, and it is difficult to access accurate information. If political elites only tell an autocratic leader what they want to hear, there may be false reporting of output and no mechanism to be transparent about policy failures.

Growth in democracies is also less volatile both between countries and within countries over time (Rodrik 2000). Autocracies like China have experienced spectacular growth rates, but there are a far greater number of autocracies that have performed terribly, like Venezuela, Haiti, Guinea, North Korea and Chad. In fact, autocracies, far more than democracies, are likely to be associated with economic devastation and state collapse. For every Singapore, there is the Democratic Republic of Congo, which has seen its autocratic leadership steal and squander all of the country's resources. According to Morton Halperin and colleagues (2009), the probability of any country experiencing a 10 percent decline in annual per capita GDP from 1960 to 2005 was 3.4 percent, but for democracies, it was less than one percent.

Additionally, democracies grow more steadily in a given county over time (Rodrik 2008). An autocracy might temporarily experience growth but they will tend to revert to where they were initially, or even experience an even steeper decline. Democracies, in contrast, are more likely to experience a stable pattern of growth and decline.

While both regimes have the potential to implement pro-growth policies, democracies pursue a number of other benefits in terms of development that are important to citizens. As mentioned, democracies are more likely to invest in their citizens – in education, healthcare and infrastructure (Brown & Hunter 2004; Kaufman & Segura-Ubiergo 2001; Min 2008; Stasavage 2005). Democracies are more likely to focus on the welfare of their citizens and, not surprisingly, see their citizens live longer and healthier lives than citizens in autocracies (Przeworski et al. 2000; Halperin et al. 2009). Infant mortality rates, child mortality rates and maternal death rates are also better in democracies (Kudamatsu 2012; Navia & Zweifel 2003). Citizens in democracies are also paid better wages. Democracy also has a particularly important effect on women. Women living in autocracies earn much less than women in democracies, have more children, and are more likely to die in childbirth (Przeworski et al. 2000). Citizens in democracies also have higher calorie consumption rates than in autocracies (Blaydes & Kayser 2011).

Democracies have numerous advantages when it comes to development because their voters hold democratically elected leaders accountable. Thus, elected representatives have greater incentive to invest in areas that citizens support and if they fail to do so, will be voted out of office. Amartya Sen (1999) famously noted that there has never been a famine (cf. Box 7.4) in a democracy. Opposition parties, civil society and a free press ensure that steps are taken to avert a slow-moving disaster like a famine. Citizens may lack accurate information in autocracies and are unable to hold leaders to account even if they want to (Keefer 2004).

Nevertheless, some studies question the conclusion that democracies perform better on development indicators. Casey Mulligan et al. (2004) find that there are no major differences between autocracies and democracies in terms of education spending. Rory Truex (2017) claims that democracies are better at ensuring that their citizens have access to clean water, but that evidence is inconclusive that they are able to foster lower infant mortality rates and lengthen life expectancies.

There are also examples of autocracies that have built-in mechanisms for ensuring that public goods are implemented effectively. China lifted 400-500 million people out of poverty and worked effectively to control malaria significantly. Life expectancy has risen, and infant and child mortality rates have dropped. Field work by Lily Tsai (2007) has demonstrated that in China, solidarity groups ensure that public officials are held accountable by spreading information about how the community is functioning. Local elections also serve to keep local leaders on task and have led to increased public good investment in villages (Luo et al. 2007). Surprisingly, democracies do not perform better than autocracies when it comes to inequality. Although this may seem counter-intuitive, the evidence is mixed on the impact of regime type on equality. One explanation for this is that though democracies spend more on education and healthcare, these investments seem to benefit the middle and upper classes (Ross 2006; Nelson 2007).

MEASUREMENT Development is measured in numerous ways – studies can look at GDP growth rates, GDP per capita growth rates, income inequality as measured by the GINI index, poverty rates (such as the percentage of the population living below the poverty line, and the percentage of the population living under $2.25 a day). Other measures of development include looking at education variables such as literacy rates, the percentage of children enrolled in school, average number of years of schooling, life expectancy, child, infant and maternal mortality rates, number of hospital beds, doctors and medical personnel per capita and the percentage of the population with access to clean water and a flush toilet.

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES Past studies compared authoritarian regimes to democracies using ordinary least squares regressions which would compare economic growth rates across countries. More recent studies have used panel data techniques to measure economic growth rates within countries over time to see if democratization or autocratization made much of a difference. This helps to understand the impact of different regime types while controlling for factors such as geography, natural resources and colonization, for example. Studies that have looked within countries have found that democracy has a positive impact on growth rates (Rodrik & Wacziarg 2005; Papaioannou & Siourounis 2008; Persson & Tabellini 2007).

EXAMPLES From the 1960s until the 1990s much attention was on the phenomenal growth rates of the Asian Tigers (cf. Box 7.3). Countries such as Singapore, South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, as well as Indonesia, Thailand and Malaysia were able to transform their economies completely and spearhead impressive growth, growing three times as fast as countries in Latin America and five times as fast as countries in Africa (Jilberto & Mommen 2012). All of the countries pursued sound economic policies, built strong institutions and economies of scale and used an export-oriented strategy. They were also noted for being authoritarian at the time of their growth. The consensus was that a major reason for their success was that these regimes were free to pursue potentially unpopular policies and force the labor force to make sacrifices that would not have been possible in democratic regimes.

The most textbook case was Singapore, which was run by the People's Action Party (PAP) for decades and was able to pursue a long-term development strategy uninterrupted by other regimes changing course. As such, it developed rapidly into an industrialized modern economy that would become a major center for high-tech industries and finance. Property rights were respected, credit was easily available, key industries were targeted, and wages were kept low in order to encourage high savings and investment. The country also expanded its health care system and educational system and invested more in its infrastructure. Singapore was also a standout for having well-developed and impartial bureaucratic and judicial institutions, and political institutions that offered some checks on the prime minister.

The institutions in other Asian states were not quite as developed, but many of these regimes had strong legal systems, protected property rights and provided strong incentives for firms to be efficient using both market and command approaches. Policies also encouraged the accumulation of capital and high savings rates. The states also heavily invested in research and development and human and physical capital. Support for firms was based on strong performance. Labor was repressed, and wages were kept low.

As a result, growth rates in Asian authoritarian regimes were higher on average than in other democratic regimes outside the region. Growth rates also fell in Indonesia when it transitioned to democracy and were lower in Thailand during the years that it was a full democracy. Nevertheless, the impact of democratization was not conclusive. Growth rates were faster in South Korea, the Philippines and Bangladesh during the years they were democratic. Additionally, one of the strongest economic performers in the region is Japan, which has been a democracy for decades. This entry, however, does not take into account that all of these regimes heavily benefited from vast amounts of Western foreign aid. In many ways, the growth rates in authoritarian regimes in Asia were an exception, not the rule. In fact, once researchers removed East Asia from the sample, authoritarian growth rates plummeted, while democracies remained steady. Low-income democracies are also less volatile than their authoritarian counterparts (Halperin et al. 2009).

IMPACT ON POLICY The authoritarian advantage idea generated attention on the impact of regime type on economic growth, leading some policymakers to pause the drive to push for elections as a panacea to underdevelopment. There was a rise in advocacy for 'sequentialism' – or supporting countries in establishing the rule of law first and foremost over other democratic institutions, particularly multi-party elections. This spawned a host of different studies to examine which types of democratic institutions were conducive to growth and the same for authoritarian regimes. Some autocracies do not have turnover in power but have other institutional checks that mimic democracy. Scholars continue to work to understand better what is the right institutional combination that works best to stimulate economic growth and development.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Economic Development in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Acemoglu, D. and Robinson, J.A., 2006. De facto political power and institutional persistence. American Economic Review, 96:2.

Alesina, A. and Rodrik, D., 1994. Distributive politics and economic growth. The Quarterly Journal of Economics, 109:2.

Besley, T. and Coate, S., 1998. Sources of inefficiency in a representative democracy: a dynamic analysis. American Economic Review.

Barro, R.J., 1996. Democracy and growth. Journal of Economic Growth, 1:1.

Barro, R. and Sala-i-Martin, X., 2004. Economic growth, (second edition), The MIT Press.

Baum, M.A. and Lake, D.A., 2003. The political economy of growth: democracy and human capital. American Journal of Political Science, 47:2.

Bhagwati, J.N., 2002. Democracy and development: cruel dilemma or symbiotic relationship? Review of Development Economics, 6:2.

Blaydes, L. and Kayser, M.A., 2011. Counting calories: democracy and distribution in the developing world. International Studies Quarterly, 55:4.

Bratton, M. and van de Walle, N., 1994. Neopatrimonial regimes and political transitions in Africa. World politics, 46:4.

Brown, D.S. and Hunter, W., 2004. Democracy and human capital formation: education spending in Latin America, 1980 to 1997. Comparative Political Studies, 37:7.

Frantz, E. and Ezrow, N., 2022. The Politics of Dictatorship. Lynne Rienner Publishers.

Haggard, S. and Kaufman, R.R., 2018. The political economy of democratic transitions. Princeton University Press.

Halperin, M., Siegle, J. and Weinstein, M., 2009. The democracy advantage: How democracies promote prosperity and peace. Routledge.

Huntington, S.P., 1968. Political order in changing societies. Yale University Press.

Jilberto, A.E.F. and Mommen, A., eds., 2012. Liberalization in the developing world: institutional and economic changes in Latin America, Africa and Asia. Routledge.

Kaufman, R.R. and Segura-Ubiergo, A., 2001. Globalization, domestic politics, and social spending in Latin America: a time-series cross-section analysis, 1973-97. World politics, 53:4.

Keefer, P., 2004. A review of the political economy of governance: From property rights to voice. World Bank.

Kudamatsu, M., 2012. Has democratization reduced infant mortality in sub-Saharan Africa? Evidence from micro data. Journal of the European Economic Association, 10:6.

La Porta, R., Lopez-de-Silanes, F., Shleifer, A. and Vishny, R., 1999. The quality of government. The Journal of Law, Economics, and Organization, 15:1.

Luo, R., Zhang, L., Huang, J. and Rozelle, S., 2007. Elections, fiscal reform and public goods provision in rural China. Journal of Comparative Economics, 35:3.

Maravall, J.M., 1994. The myth of the authoritarian advantage. Journal of Democracy, 5:4.

March, J.G. and Olsen, J.P., 1983. The new institutionalism: Organizational factors in political life. American Political Science Review, 78:3.

Min, B., 2008. Democracy and light: Electoral accountability and the provision of public goods. In Annual Meeting of the Midwest Political Science Association.

Mulligan, C.B., Gil, R. and Sala-i-Martin, X., 2004. Do democracies have different public policies than non-democracies? Journal of Economic Perspectives, 18:1.

Navia, P. and Zweifel, T.D., 2003. Democracy, dictatorship, and infant mortality revisited. Journal of Democracy, 14:3.

Nelson, J.M., 2007. Elections, democracy, and social services. Studies in Comparative International Development, 41:4.

North, D.C., 1990. Institutions, institutional change and economic performance. Cambridge University Press.

North, D.C., Wallis, J.J. and Weingast, B.R., 2009. Violence and social orders: A conceptual framework for interpreting recorded human history. Cambridge University Press.
Papaioannou, E. and Siourounis, G., 2008. Democratisation and growth. The Economic Journal, 118:532.
Persson, T. and Tabellini, G., 1994. Does centralization increase the size of government? European Economic Review, 38:3-4.
Persson, T. and Tabellini, G., 2007. The growth effect of democracy: is it heterogeneous and how can it be estimated?
Przeworski, A., Alvarez, R.M., Alvarez, M.E., Cheibub, J.A., Limongi, F. and Neto, F.P.L., 2000. Democracy and development: Political institutions and well-being in the world, 1950-1990. Cambridge University Press.
Przeworski, A., Limongi, F. and Giner, S., 1995. Political regimes and economic growth. In Democracy and development, Palgrave Macmillan.
Robinson, J.A. and Acemoglu, D., 2012. Why nations fail: The origins of power, prosperity and poverty. Profile.
Rock, M.T., 2009. Has democracy slowed growth in Asia? World Development, 37:5.
Rodrik, D., 1999. Where did all the growth go? External shocks, social conflict, and growth collapses. Journal of economic growth, 4:4.
Rodrik, D., 2000. Institutions for high-quality growth: what they are and how to acquire them. Studies in comparative international development, 35:3.
Rodrik, D. and Wacziarg, R., 2005. Do democratic transitions produce bad economic outcomes? American Economic Review, 95:2.
Ross, M., 2006. Is democracy good for the poor? American Journal of Political Science, 50:4.
Sen, A., 2014. Development as freedom (1999). In The globalization and development reader: Perspectives on development and global change (second edition), Timmons Roberts, J., Bellone Hite, A. and Chorov, N. eds., Wiley Blackwell Publishing.
Sirowy, L. and Inkeles, A., 1990. The Effects of Democracy on Economic Growth and Inequality: A Review. Studies in Comparative International Development (SCID), 25:1.
Stasavage, D., 2005. Democracy and education spending in Africa. American Journal of Political Science, 49:2.
Tavares, J. and Wacziarg, R., 2001. How democracy affects growth. European Economic Review, 45:8.
Truex, R., 2017. The myth of the democratic advantage. Studies in Comparative International Development, 52:3.
Tsai, L.L., 2007. Solidary groups, informal accountability, and local public goods provision in rural China. American Political Science Review, 101:2.
Tsebelis, G., 2002. Veto Players: How Political Institutions Work. Princeton University Press.

Box 7.3 East Asian Tigers: Illiberal Growth?

Better to live one day as a tiger than a thousand years as a sheep.
– Tipu Sahib (ca. 1750-1799), Sultan of Mysore in India

The 'East Asian Tigers' – Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong and China, are countries that, under strong political leadership (either democratic or authoritarian), have industrialized, transited and become competitive, prosperous (geo)economies. A subset – South Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Singapore – is known as the 'Asian little dragons' or 'four Asian tigers.' They first emerged as the newly-industrialized Asian countries in the 1970s and 1980s. In their political-economic systems, politics and business became inseparable in pursuing export-oriented industrialization, which emerged during a time of economic liberalism without political liberalism. (Tipton 2002: 348, 386) According to the 'governed market' theory, these countries achieved significant economic success due to active state intervention and substantial investments in neighboring developing countries. (Cheung 2000: 293) This model stands in contrast to both classical liberal capitalism and Marxist socialism.

The East Asian developmental model refers to the economic strategy and policies often characterized by combining export-led growth, high savings, strategic industrial policies, and strong government intervention in the economy to generate growth and welfare production. East Asian tigers are known for their rapid industrialization, which was based on continuous technological upgrading, financed predominantly through the banking system. This approach has proven to be effective in promoting economic growth and development. (Mikheeva 2019) Two core concepts defined this developmental model: state autonomy and state capacity, in particular, ruling over weak civil society, social classes and private capital, strengthening the role of government in the national political economy, consisting of a complex network of social relations among producers, traders and consumers. (Kim et al. 2013: 316)

Japan's developmental state, from 1925 to 1975, was characterized by interventionist policies that spanned both the imperial and post-war periods (Tonami 2018: 1211). This model served as an alternative to both command and mixed economies. Central to this system was the 'Iron Triangle,' a close collaboration between politicians, bureaucrats, and businesses that supported export-oriented industrialization, the formation of cartels and horizontal structures like keiretsu along the 'city banks.' (Keiretsu – 系列 refers to a grouping of interlocking businesses and shareholdings into loose conglomerates. These replaced the previous (vertical) imperialist zaibatsu (財閥 – financial cartel) system from pre-WWII Japan, which was dismantled under Allied occupation). Key institutions such as the Ministry of International Trade and Industry (MITI) and the Bank of Japan played essential roles in mediating between large business conglomerates and the state, driving Japan's post-war economic miracle. Japan's access to US markets allowed it to export goods and accumulate capital, which supported its capital market development. Skilled bureaucrats managed this transition, while post-war democratic governments led by the Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) regulated development both domestically and internationally through economic diplomacy. MITI also consciously promoted offshoring as part of its broader strategy (Gray 2011: 579). Chalmers Johnson famously described this model as the 'developmental state' (Johnson 1982; Tonami 2018: 1213), a term that has since become widely used in the literature on newly industrialized states.

The 'flying geese model' is a theory of economic development that describes how industrialization and economic growth spread across East Asia in a hierarchical pattern, with Japan leading the way, followed by other countries in the region. Japanese economist Kaname Akamatsu first proposed this model in the 1930s during Japan's imperial period. It suggests that as Japan developed certain industries, it would later relocate outdated or less competitive sectors to neighboring countries, reducing economic and environmental costs at home. This relocation facilitated the transfer of industrial knowledge, foreign capital, and management practices to these countries, allowing them to develop their own industries.

The model envisions a V-shaped formation of countries, with Japan at the front as the 'leading goose,' followed by other nations like South Korea and Taiwan, and later China and Southeast Asian nations (foremost Singapore). As Japan moved up the value chain into more advanced industries, it passed on older technologies and industries to its neighbors, which could then replicate and build upon Japan's experience. This process helped to create a regional pattern of industrialization where countries progressively followed Japan's developmental trajectory.

Although the model has been criticized for its association with Japanese imperialism (Box 4.2) of the pre-WWII era, it was later used to explain Japan's post-war regional economic resurgence and its role in fostering economic growth in East Asia during the latter half of the twentieth century. The flying geese model illustrates how regional economic integration occurred through a sequential process of industrial upgrading and diffusion across East Asia. The PRC recycled a similar theoretical pattern in promoting the new Belt and Road Initiative in 2015.

Both Taiwan and South Korea drew inspiration from Japan's developmental model, but each country adapted the approach to suit its unique circumstances and goals. This model differed from the socialist centralized systems prevalent in other regions, as it involved authoritative or dictatorial regimes. After WWII, both Taiwan and South Korea – former colonies of the Empire of Japan – were governed by authoritarian regimes that shared a strong anti-communist stance. Under US protection during the Cold War, American grand strategy aimed to promote economic development among its East Asian allies, who were facing threats from the PRC and North Korea (DPRK). US aid agencies played a critical role in state-building efforts in Japan, South Korea, and Taiwan, offering support for economic planning (Lee 2020: 737). In this geopolitical arrangement, the US acted as a patron state, while Japan, Korea, and Taiwan (the 'JAKOTA' region) were client states for both economic and security purposes. This distinguishes these countries from the next generation of developmental states, such as China (Lee 2020: 742).

Unlike South Korea and Taiwan, Japan's state was consensus-based rather than a strong-state model. This allowed Japan to avoid pitfalls like political scandals or conflicts of interest between the state and businesses (cf. crony capitalism – Box 1.10). The Japanese economy thrived under a system of communitarian capitalism, where conglomerates evolved from informal cartels based on co-prosperity principles. Similar to Japan's business networks, the (South) Korean-type chaebol (재벌 – 'rich clan' – a family-owned zaibatsu) and Taiwanese conglomerates expanded into China via Hong Kong or into Southeast Asia via Singapore. The promotion of manufactured exports – a key theme in the World Bank's 'East Asian Miracle' (1993) – was later downplayed as exports were seen largely as a private sector response to macroeconomic stability and economic freedom (McNicoll 2014: 298). Both South Korea and Taiwan pursued an Anglo-American neoliberal model of capitalism, building on neo-mercantilist political economies (Gray 2011: 580), supported by access to US markets and military needs related to conflicts in Korea (1950-1953), crises over the Taiwan Strait (1954-1955, 1958), and the Vietnam War (1955-1975).

In South Korea, unlike the Bank of Japan, the Korea Development Bank had less autonomy from the government. Bureaucrats set export targets, and national ownership of banks helped coordinate industrial conglomerates in capital accumulation (Mikheeva 2019: 597). Under Park Chung Hee's dictatorial regime (1961-1979), South Korea transformed from a poverty-stricken country into a prosperous economy (Kang 2010). The Economic Planning Board created five-year Economic Development Plans (Kim et al. 2013: 235), with technological priorities shifting over time. In the 1970s, the focus was on heavy and chemical industries; in the 1980s, it shifted to shipbuilding, machinery, and steel sectors; and by the 1990s, loans were directed toward export-oriented manufacturing (Mikheeva 2019: 598).

In the Republic of China (ROC – Taiwan), the government played a central role in guiding economic development under the dictatorial leadership of Chiang Kai-shek (1887-1975) and the Kuomintang (國民黨 – Guómíndǎng) party. The China Development Corporation's lending portfolio shifted from textiles and petrochemicals in the 1960s and 1970s to electronics, semiconductors, and information technology (IT) industries in the 1980s. By the 2000s, it expanded to include optoelectronics, alternative energy, healthcare, and consumer goods. This reorganization led to the creation of specialized industrial groups for each of these sectors (Mikheeva 2019: 601-602). Taiwan's industrialization was also shaped by US grand strategy within Sino-American relations. The election of the Democratic Progressive Party (DPP) in 2000 tested Taiwan's democratic transition due to the legacy of state corporatism and the close ties between the Kuomintang Party, the state, and business elites. Their ascent to power also tested Taiwan's relations with the PRC (Gray 2011: 585, 591).

Hong Kong was unique among East Asian tigers in achieving impressive economic results without significant industrialization (Cheung 2000: 295). It developed under the 'One Country, Two Systems' policy, which allowed for a degree of civil liberties while striving for international competitiveness and recognition. Hong Kong served as a gateway for opening markets in the PRC, starting with special economic zones in Chinese coastal provinces. From the 1980s onward, Taiwanese overseas investments flowed through Hong Kong, which acted as a funding conduit. Kuomintang's development investments and private contacts with mainland China contributed to China's economic emergence. Cross-strait trade increased significantly with China's market reforms (capitalism with 'Chinese characteristics') and Taiwan's liberalization (Gray 2011: 592). However, unlike Taiwan, the expectation that capitalist development would lead to political democratization in the PRC was proven false after the Tiananmen Square repression in 1989.

Although Singapore is not typically considered one of the East Asian tigers, it played a significant role as an 'Asian little tiger' in contributing to China's development – the largest tiger economy in Asia. Since its establishment in 1965, Singapore has achieved remarkable economic growth as a developmental state in Southeast Asia (Huff 1995). It has emerged as a regional hub along growth zones such as the Singapore-Johor-Riau 'Growth Triangle' ('SIJORI'). As a city-state strategically located between the Straits of Malacca and the South China Sea, the Singapore model incorporated successful elements from Japan, South Korea, Taiwan, and Hong Kong. The government played a crucial role in its development strategy, which was influenced by a mix of Western and Eastern values (Han-Yin Chang 2003: 85). Unlike Hong Kong, which had access to a pool of entrepreneurs, Singapore had to import and purchase technology to fuel its growth.

The Singaporean government implemented economic policies that involved transnational and multinational corporations in its industrialization process, with the Development Bank of Singapore playing a key role (Mikheeva 2019: 603). Since 1965, the People's Action Party (PAP) has been the dominant political force in Singapore. Under the leadership of Lee Kuan Yew (reign: 1959-2011), the PAP successfully managed challenges such as ethnic diversity, pressure groups, and media control. Singapore combined a free-market economic system with an authoritarian political system, balancing economic growth with political control. The transition from a poor to a wealthy city-state is linked to values such as elitism, conservative liberalism, communitarianism, and pragmatism (Han-Yin Chang 2003: 101). This success has made Singapore one of the most developed countries in the world, a notable source of soft power.

The PRC, one of the major Communist regimes globally, has made tremendous economic progress over the past four decades, lifting hundreds of millions out of poverty. China's development path shares characteristics with the developmental state model (Seung-Wook Baek 2005). In addition to corporate governance, key features include government support for state-owned enterprises (SOEs), import-substituting industrialization in heavy industries, high dependence on export markets, and a high domestic savings rate. Among East Asian countries, China's developmental model shares more similarities with Taiwan than with Japan or South Korea. Specifically, the public sector in China specializes in capital-intensive and import-substituting industrialization, while the non-public sector focuses on export-oriented industrialization (Seung-Wook Baek 2005: 494). China's development is thus based on a combination of public and non-public ownership and a heavy reliance on export markets (Seung-Wook Baek 2005: 496).

Shaped by neoliberal globalization, China emulated aspects of the developmental state model and became one of the world's major export-oriented economies. By 2010, China surpassed Japan to become the second-largest economy globally and is projected to surpass the United States by 2030, potentially. According to Nicola Meier's (2009) study on China's automobile industry, China's development model is an innovative blend of factors from developmental states and legacies of its past command economy. Under limited political pluralism and strong state regulation, China adopted market economy mechanisms while maintaining significant state involvement through SOEs in strategic sectors like heavy industry and manufacturing. These enterprises were instrumental in driving China's economic growth and export expansion through initiatives such as the Belt and Road Initiative.

The optimistic tone surrounding East Asia's developmental model began to fade after the Asian Financial Crisis in 1997. The International Monetary Fund's bailout of South Korea that year and the subsequent neoliberal restructuring were seen by some as evidence that the era of the developmental state had ended and that East Asian tigers were transitioning towards neoliberalism (Gray 2011: 578).

How to cite:

Laš, Lukáš, 2025. East Asian Tigers: Illiberal Growth? Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Baek, S.-W., 2005. Does China follow "the East Asian development model"? Journal of Contemporary Asia, 35:4.

Cheung, A.B.L., 2000. New Interventionism in the Making: Interpreting state interventions in Hong Kong after the change of sovereignty. Journal of Contemporary China, 9:24.

Gray, K., 2011. Taiwan and the geopolitics of late development, The Pacific Review, 24:5.

Han-Yin Chang, J. 2003. Culture, state and economic development in Singapore. Journal of Contemporary Asia, 33:1.

Huff, W. G., 1995. The developmental state, government, and Singapore's economic development since 1960. World Development, 23:8

Johnson, C., 1982. MITI and the Japanese Miracle. Stanford University Press.

Kang, W.-T., 2010. Missing the Dictator in a New Democracy: Analyzing the "Park Chung Hee Syndrome" in South Korea. Political and Military Sociology: An Annual Review, 38.

Kim, E.M., Kim, P.H. and Kim, J., 2013. From development to development cooperation: foreign aid, country ownership, and the developmental state in South Korea. The Pacific Review, 26:3.

Lee, J., 2020. US grand strategy and the origins of the developmental state. J*ournal of Strategic Studies, 43*:5.

McNicoll, G., 2014. Asian Tigers, African Lions: Comparing the Development Performance of Southeast Asia and Africa. Bulletin of Indonesian Economic Studies, 50:2.

Meier, N., 2009. China - The New Developmental State? Peter Lang.

Mikheeva, O., 2019. Financing of innovation: national development banks in newly industrialized countries of East Asia. Journal of Post Keynesian Economics, 42:4.

Tipton, F.B., 2002. Government and the economy in Japan: the Japanese model of development. Asian Studies Review, 26:3.

Tonami, A., 2018. Exporting the developmental state: Japan's economic diplomacy in the Arctic. Third World Quarterly, 39:6.

Box 7.4 Famine: The Third Horseman of the Apocalypse

Уничтожим кулака как класс!
(We shall eradicate the kulaks as a class!)
– Slogan of the Soviet 'dekulakization' campaign, 1929.

A hungry stomach has no ears
– Jean de la Fontaine

Famines – understood here as the widespread scarcity of food causing mass starvation and illness – might be a conscious or unconscious result under dictatorship. As authoritarian regimes often emerge from wars, revolutions or coups, their leadership feels obliged to fulfill their initial postulates and promises regardless of their sense and costs.

Until the twentieth century, most famines were caused by successive crop failures, often triggered by biospheric factors such as droughts, floods, climate change, or epidemics, or by anthropogenic factors such as wars. Elmann (2000; 2005) distinguishes between two principal categories of Food Availability Declines (FAD). The first, FAD1, refers to largely unavoidable causes, such as biospheric disruptions, while the second, FAD2, involves avoidable causes that can be mitigated through appropriate preventive or reactive measures.

Howe and Devereux (2004) categorized famines into two principal phases based on their intensity and magnitude, defining 'great famines' as those with 100,000 to one million victims. In terms of spatial impact, famines can be classified as global (planetary), state-level, or regional/local events.

Famines in authoritarian regimes can be classified based on several criteria. One distinction is between natural and human-caused famines. In the case of natural disasters, the regime's competence is tested by its response to the crisis. In contrast, human-caused famines can arise from a variety of factors. Authoritarian regimes often deflect responsibility for such crises, blaming internal enemies and external circumstances or falsely attributing the causes to natural events.

Famines can also be categorized by their temporal causes: short-term (acute) versus long-term (chronic) famines. Short-term famines are typically linked to sudden structural changes in the economy or social system,

Table 7.1 – Significant Famines in Modern Dictatorships

State/region	Period	Causes	Ideology and later Interpretation
USSR (Kazakhstan, Russia, Ukraine, Turkestan)	1918-1922	(Civil) war, Bolshevik economic policy, blockade of food transport, drought	Implementation of Lenin's dogmatics
USSR	1932-1934	Collectivization	Implementation of Marxist-Leninist dogmatics under Stalin Ukraine (partially Kazakhstan) – conscious genocide
USSR	1941-1944	World War II, Leningrad blockade, occupation of Kharkiv and Kyiv	Heroization of victims and the city by the USSR
Poland	1939-1945	War, concentration camps, ghettos	Nazi ideology, elimination of Jews and other enemies of the state
Vietnam	1945-1946	War for independence	Anti-colonial struggle
USSR	1946-1947	Drought, ideology (crop export to support Soviet satellite countries)	International aid with ideological background
China	1958-1961	Collectivization, floods, extraction of food from regions to elite	Implementation of The Great Leap Forward ideological construct
Ethiopia	1972	Drought, poor governance	Fall of the empire and rise of the Derg dictatorship
Ethiopia	1984-1985	Drought, civil war, economic mismanagement, repression (forced migration and relocation, rise of military expenditures)
Somalia	1991-1992	Civil war, drought	Genocide of Ishaak clan in Somaliland
North Korea	1995-2000	Floods and droughts, suspension of food imports (embargoes and disintegration of the USSR)

Source: Author's own work.

such as revolutions, wars, or collectivization efforts. Long-term famines, on the other hand, reveal deeper structural issues within the regime that hinder its ability to produce and distribute sufficient food to its population. In many cases, these chronic issues stem from radical transformations in the economy and society initiated by the authoritarian regime.

The rise of authoritarian and totalitarian regimes in the twentieth and twenty-first centuries has significantly contributed to famines resulting from economic policies or wars. These famines – see Table 7.1 for selected examples – have severely undermined states' capacities to grow and distribute enough food for their populations. Three principal characteristics of dictatorships contribute to famine and FAD2: (a) implementation of a strong ideology with Utopian and radical objectives; (b) dogmatic state behavior as well as state capture of the administration and the economy by the regime; (c) the relentless pursuit of personal prestige and ambitions by the leader or leadership group.

Authoritarian regimes tend to centralize and concentrate resources, redistributing them primarily to the ruling elite or central urban areas, particularly capitals, in order to legitimize the regime both domestically and internationally (Sen 1981; Haggard & Noland 2007: 68). J. Wallace (2013) refers to this urban bias as the 'Faustian bargain.' Such predatory behavior often results in resource shortages for other regions, the dismantling of existing socio-economic systems, and the expropriation of resources from the lower levels of society. Moreover, as Liu et al. (2022: 2) demonstrated, food expropriation can disproportionately affect wealthier regions more than poorer ones. The role of regional leaders is also crucial in either mitigating or exacerbating starvation (Cai 2020; Kung & Chen 2011).

At the same time, as Davies and Wheatcroft (2006; 2016) showed in the case of the Soviet famine of 1932-1934, personalist rule can indirectly drive famine. Such regimes often establish ineffective and unaccountable systems that benefit only those in power. In some cases, personalization within regimes leads to mass purges or targeted attacks against ethnic or social groups. This is a common interpretation in discussions surrounding the Holodomor (голодомор – 'death by hunger') in Ukraine during the 1930s (Kasianov 2008). The USSR's approach toward Ukraine contrasts with debates over the asharshilik (ашаршылық – famine) during the collectivization and forced migrations in Kazakhstan (Kindler 2018; Cameron 2018). Notably, this debate is absent in contemporary Russia.

In contrast to more democratic regimes, where consultations or elections can hold leaders accountable, authoritarian regimes often suffer from a lack of accountability and responsibility toward their populations. This can lead to irrational decision-making processes that are not corrected internally, resulting in food shortages and famines (Zewde 2002: 263). Censorship further exacerbates these issues by limiting the spread of information about famines. While this may help prevent public discontent – something authoritarian regimes seek to avoid – it also restricts effective responses to starvation and hinders external aid, as acknowledging famine would be seen as an admission of failure.

As a result, many authoritarian regimes limit the influence of NGOs and international organizations like UN agencies to prevent their involvement in famine relief efforts. Such involvement could tarnish the regime's image or expose its underlying nature. This was evident during the North Korean famine of the 1990s when the regime tightly controlled humanitarian aid distribution, preventing foreign donors from reaching the worst-affected areas (Haggard & Noland 2007: 92-97).

How to cite:

Horák, Slavomír, 2025. Famine: The Third Horseman of the Apocalypse, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cai, Y., 2020. Community Elites and Collective Action: The State and the Starved during the Chinese Famine (1959-61). Politics & Society, 48:1.

Cameron, S., 2018. The Hungry Steppe: Famine, Violence, and the Making of Soviet Kazakhstan. Cornell University Press.

Davies, R. W. and Wheatcroft, S.G., 2006. Stalin and the Soviet Famine of 1932-33: A reply to Ellman. Europe-Asia Studies, 58:4.

Davies, R.W. and Wheatcroft, S.G., 2016. The Years of Hunger: Soviet Agriculture, 1931-1933. Palgrave Macmillan.

Ellman, M.J., 2000. The 1947 Soviet famine and the entitlement approach to famines. Cambridge Journal of Economy, 24:5.

Ellman, M.J., 2005. The role of leadership perceptions and of intent in the Soviet Famine of 1931-1934. Europe-Asia Studies, 57:6.

Haggard, S. and Noland, M., 2007. Famine in North Korea: Markets, Aid, and Reform. Columbia University Press.

Kasianov, G., 2008. Revisiting the great famine of 1932-1933: Politics of memory and public consciousness (Ukraine after 1991). In Past in the Making: Historical Revisionism in Central Europe After 1989, Kopeček, M., ed., CEU Press.

Kindler, R., 2018. Stalin's nomads: power and famine in Kazakhstan. University of Pittsburgh Press.

Kung, J.K.S., & Chen, S., 2011. The tragedy of the nomenklatura: Career incentives and political radicalism during China's Great Leap famine. American Political Science Review, 105:1.

Liu, M., Shih, V. and Zhang, D., 2022. Revolution, State Building, and the Great Famine in China. Political Research Quarterly, 76:3.

Sen, A., 1981. Poverty and Famines: An Essay on Entitlement and Deprivation. Oxford University Press.

Wallace, J., 2013. Cities, redistribution, and authoritarian regime survival. The Journal of Politics, 75:3.

Zewde, B., 2002. A History of Modern Ethiopia. Addis Ababa University Press.

Education in Authoritarian Regimes

Education breeds confidence. Confidence breeds hope. Hope breeds peace.
– Confucius

One of the critical components for any authoritarian regime is to gain a stronger grip on society – and the key to this process is winning over hearts and minds at a young age. Ensuring that the citizenry is committed not just to the nation but also to the regime is an important objective. In order to accomplish this, authoritarian regimes use propaganda and indoctrination, censorship and information control, emphasize obedience and respect for authority – utilizing authoritarian teaching methods, monitor educators and students (cf. academic freedom) and may prevent some groups from accessing higher education.

Most notably, authoritarian regimes rely on mass education campaigns in order to promote an ideology that justifies the regime and socializes segments of the population in ways that can prevent a future uprising (Paglayan 2017). The crucial importance of the Education Reform in indoctrination was illustrated by Romanian Communist Minister of Education, Gheorghe Gheorghiu-Dej himself: "The Ministry of Education is not a part time job of four hours. It is more important than the State Security Ministry because we had to destroy the enemy from the cultural domain" (Vasile 2009).

As many authoritarian regimes use education to indoctrinate the masses, the first step is to change and update the curricula. In Italy under Benito Mussolini (1922-1943), all old textbooks were replaced with new ones in order to ensure the devotion of the next generation of Italians (Wood & DeLuca 2012). In Spain under Francisco Franco, the textbooks were updated to highlight the economic and social achievements of the Franco regime, while anti-democratic political messages and an emphasis on family and the Catholic faith were a constant (Aguilar 2009). In Chile, under Augusto Pinochet, the state made substantial changes to the curricula, indoctrinating students with the idea that collective ways of coping with demands were wrong (Preda 2012). History books also omitted certain events and revised and distorted the past (Pastrana 2007). The curriculum of Albanian schools was a strong force in disseminating the communist doctrine to students. Starting from 1946, the Minster of Education made the political and ideological principles of the Albanian Communist Party an integral part of the educational program (Staar 1982).

Authoritarian regimes not only indoctrinated students but also engaged in teaching methods that discouraged critical thinking. Pedagogy promotes respect for authority and an emphasis on rote memorization (Algan et al. 2013) – see also the authoritarian personality. From a young age, students in authoritarian regimes are taught to follow directions, and repeat what had been taught without ever questioning the content. Such methods are at odds with liberal views of education, which stresses the need to develop autonomous thinking individuals. In Turkey, the teaching methods do not promote critical thinking with no opposition to the regime permitted in the classroom. Instead, rote memorization of sayings was encouraged in order to instill the state's ideology and teach students to be subservient to authority. In Egypt, there was little opportunity to discuss, debate and ask questions. Developing critical thinking and a political consciousness was discouraged. Textbooks need to be faithfully memorized and never questioned. Students were taught to submit to authority and be passive and loyal to the regime (Mirshak 2020).

The teaching methods in the Soviet Union were also designed to create a certain type of citizen. Children entered school at seven, and activities were designed around creating a collective. As such, schools were organized as miniature versions of the Soviet State. Each classroom was a unit of the Communist Youth Organization (Коммунистический союз молодёжи, abbreviated as: 'Комсомол' – 'Komsomol'), while the school was designed as a brigade. Independent thinking was not cultivated, and deviants were kept in line. Children were actually encouraged to denounce rule breakers, resulting in classroom trials. Children were also encouraged to behave like party members – with the state overtaking the role of the family in shaping minds and values (Matthews 2012).

In many authoritarian regimes, teachers were trained to comply with the strict objectives of the state. In Albania, teacher training was confined to focusing on rigid compliance with political indoctrination guidelines (Alhasani 2015). In Bulgaria, teachers were retrained and were responsible for daily political instruction along the lines laid down by the party secretary in each school (Glenn 1994).

In the same way that good-quality education is conducive to democratization (Sandborn & Thyne 2014), Authoritarian regimes see revamping the educational system as critical to their longevity. Though it was long viewed as something only accomplished and attempted by totalitarian regimes or ideocracies, regimes as varied as Brazil under Jair Bolsonaro, Hungary under Viktor Orbán and Russia under Vladimir Putin have all tried to exercise control through some forms of indoctrination. In the latter's case, Putin ensured that critical updates were made to history textbooks that praised Russia's invasion of Ukraine in 2022 (Sauer 2022). Not to be outdone, in Brazil, the Minister of Education tried to eliminate the use of the term gender in any educational activity that was supported by the state (Green 2019), and Hungary updated textbooks to warn students about the perils of migration and the importance of homogeneity in Hungary (McKenzie 2019). Whatever the case, the educational system will remain an important conduit for authoritarian regimes to indoctrinate their young citizens.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Education in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Aguilar, P., 2009. Whatever happened to Francoist socialization? Spaniards' values and patterns of cultural consumption in the post-dictatorial period. Democratization, 16:3.

Algan, Y., Cahuc, P. and Shleifer, A., 2013. Teaching practices and social capital. American Economic Journal: Applied Economics, 5:3.

Alhasani, M.D., 2015. Educational Turning Point in Albania: No More Mechanic Parrots but Critical Thinkers. Journal of Educational Issues, 1:2.

Glenn, C.L., 1994. Educational freedom in eastern Europe. Cato Institute.

Green, J.N., 2019. Brazil's far-right president, university autonomy, and academic freedom. Academe, 105:4.

Matthews, M., 2012. Education in the Soviet Union: Policies and institutions since Stalin, (Vol. 9). Routledge.

McKenzie, S., 2019. Why Hungary's state-sponsored schoolbooks have teachers worried. CNN.

Mirshak, N., 2020. Authoritarianism, education and the limits of political socialisation in Egypt. Power and Education, 12:1.

Paglayan, A.S., 2017. Civil war, state consolidation, and the spread of mass education. In American Political Science Association, 2017 Annual Meeting.

Preda, C., 2012. Civil society activism and authoritarian rule in Romania and Chile: evidence for the role played by art(ists). In Civil Society Activism under Authoritarian Rule, Routledge.

Sanborn, H. and Thyne, C.L., 2014. Learning democracy: Education and the fall of authoritarian regimes. British Journal of Political Science, 44:4.

Sauer, P., 2023. Russia releases history schoolbook praising Ukraine invasion. The Guardian.

Staar, R.F., 1982. Communist Regimes in Eastern Europe (Vol. 269). Hoover Press.

Vasile, C., 2009. Propaganda and Culture in Romania at the Beginning of the Communist Regime. In Stalinism revisited: The establishment of communist regimes in East-Central Europe, Tismaneanu, V., ed., Central European University Press.

Wood, R. and DeLuca, C., 2012. The Dictator's Handbook: A Practical Manual for the Aspiring Tyrant. Gull Pond Books.

Environmentalism & Authoritarianism

(…) the fundamental law of nature being the preservation of mankind, no human sanction can be good, or valid against it.
– John Locke, Two Treatises, Chapter XI, par. 135

Even the best democracies agree that when a major war approaches, democracy must be put on hold for the time being. I have a feeling that climate change may be an issue as severe as a war.
– James Lovelock, noted scientist and environmentalist (2010)

An increasing number of citizens globally are skeptical about the ability of liberal market democracies to tackle climate change effectively. Instead, they are leaning toward radical solutions. Significant segments of the environmentalist literature capitalize on this sentiment, rejecting liberal democracy and market mechanisms and showing an openness to 'authoritarian environmentalism' or 'ecological Marxism' for addressing environmental challenges. The debate on the best regime type to deal with climate change and what trade-offs are acceptable is ongoing (Shahar 2015; Mittiga 2022; Zinda 2023; Albert 2023). Enninga (2023) offers 'ordoliberalism' as an alternative to liberal democracy and its consumerist markets to meet global environmental and ecological challenges.

DEFINITION This entry briefly introduces some issues and themes associated with environmentalism and comparative authoritarianism. Note that when defining environmentalism, the (dominant) Western conceptualization of 'the environment' is an intellectual colonial legacy, perceived as a separate sphere from humans. This paradigm has influenced contemporary environmentalism and how environmental problems are perceived and addressed. Koch (2024: 213) finds that: "Geographers and other critical scholars have long challenged this divide – arguing that it is a social construction rather than an empirical fact. In fact, the rhetorical and material acts that socially construct 'nature' and 'the environment' as spheres, separate from humans, are political acts" (Castree & Braun 2001, cited in Koch 2024).

SEE ALSO This topic is closely linked to economic development, disaster management and debates on the trade-offs of authoritarian environmentalism regarding human rights, accountability and effective, sustainable policies; topics that are echoed in authoritarian disease management.

ORIGIN The political dimensions of environmentalism in the West emerged in the late 1960s alongside 'green politics' movements in the 1970s. Historically, organized environmentalism can be traced back to nineteenth-century Europe and North America, where early environmental campaigners responded to issues such as resource management and colonial conservation projects. These efforts laid the groundwork for transnational environmental networks and the first international NGOs dedicated to environmental protection (Falkner 2021). Mark Beeson (2010) has been credited with inventing 'environmental authoritarianism' when observing authoritarian developments in East Asia, in particular China's developmental trajectory.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE A new generation of scholars explores the complex relationship between authoritarian regimes and environmental policies, challenging the predominant Western perspective that often equates effective environmental policy with liberalism and individualism (cf. Brain & Pál 2019: 2). While many authoritarian regimes have poor environmental records, a broader perspective is necessary to understand how these regimes politicize environmental issues. Environmental concerns often intersect with issues of regime legitimacy and external legitimacy. Still, their 'coercive environmentalism' continues to fascinate ardent climate activists and radicalized ecologists disillusioned with the failure of liberal states to bring forth significant positive change.

Authoritarian regimes engage very differently with environmentalism. Some ignore it and shy away from committing to international norms. Some vehemently attack it, like Bolsonaro's anti-environmental agenda in Brazil (Deutsch 2021). Others may use environmental policies to enhance their legitimacy. For instance, they might engage in positive climate change initiatives or host international environmental summits to gain favor with foreign donors. Domestically, authoritarian regimes may address environmental issues proactively to prevent them from becoming focal points for anti-regime protests. The management of natural resources is also a key area where political geography plays a role, as the distribution of resources (resource curses) and their associated benefits and harms vary significantly across different authoritarian regimes (and also within regimes at sub-national level, cf. Carlitz & Povitkina (2021)). Contestation 'repertoires' (Box 5.8) of environmental activism combined with different authoritarian information-gathering practices also structure environmental policy diversity across regimes (Plantan 2018).

EXAMPLES China's environmental policy has evolved significantly, reflecting its dual role as both the world's largest emitter of greenhouse gases and a leader in renewable energy technology supply chains. Since 2012, China's leadership has been using a green 'China Dream' discourse that connects domestic environmental actions to the 'glorious revival' of the Chinese nation by aiming for global leadership on climate change. Agostinis and Urdinez (2024) find evidence that Beijing has been promoting authoritarian green policies within the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO) to its members, evidence of authoritarian norm diffusion within authoritarian regionalism.

China has committed to ambitious climate goals, including curbing carbon emissions before 2030 and achieving carbon neutrality by 2060. These targets are part of a broader strategy to integrate environmental considerations into economic development, as seen in initiatives like the national carbon trading market and substantial investments in renewable energy. However, China's approach is a top-down governance model that has raised concerns about human rights and the sustainability of its environmental policies. Policy critics argue that this model can lead to social discontent and inefficiencies, highlighting the need for more inclusive, grassroots-driven environmental initiatives. Human rights observers find that almost half of the world's supply of polysilicon, a key component of solar panels, is produced in Xinjiang, a region where government abuses against the 13 million minority Uyghur Muslims have been condemned as 'crimes against humanity' by 51 UN members (many equating them with genocide – Box 1.19). Denying these accusations, China continues to work toward taking a pivotal role in global climate efforts (Beeson 2018; Li & Shapiro 2020; Wang 2022; Lo 2020).

LITERATURE For advanced introductions to this topic, consult Eaton & Kostka (2024) and Koch (2024). For comparative works with historical and contemporary cases, consult Brain & Pál 2019; Jörgens et al. 2023. Wilson (2020) compares environmental governance in the Soviet Union, Maoist China, and Nazi Germany.

Today, scholarship is tackling the topic from various angles, ranging from the process of environmental policy development (Chen & Aschenbrenner in Jörgens et al. 2023) to green norm diffusion (Bagozzi 2013; Agostinis & Urdinez 2024). Environmental pollution under authoritarianism is also a salient but understudied topic, ranging from water management (Chen 2019; Bruun & Rubin 2022), air pollution (Ahlers & Ahen 2018; Chou et al. 2022), deforestation (Kuusela & Amacher 2016) fishing regulations (Kantel 2020); waste management (Wu & Martus 2021; Masyutina et al. 2023), to the fallout of nuclear testing. Horz et al. (2023) find that pollution becomes a significant grievance when high levels of economic growth do not compensate citizens and can signal regime incompetence.

Regarding regime types, Von Stein (2022) and Fiorino (2022) explore how different regime 'types' affect environmental policies, substituting individual variables as proxies or continuous measures as dichotomous categories. Democracies often yield positive environmental outcomes due to electoral accountability, civil liberties, and political constraints. These mechanisms can incentivize eco-friendly policies if citizens prioritize such issues. However, autocracies can implement rapid and decisive actions, sometimes necessary for urgent environmental challenges, though they often lack public participation and accountability, which can lead to policies that do not reflect citizens' preferences or address local environmental concerns comprehensively (Bruun 2020). Also, a benign, ecological authoritarianism has never existed (Fiorino 2022).

Drawing on a theory centered around the provision of environmental public goods, Böhmelt (2015) differentiates between categorical regime types (using the GWF classification) and their respective divergence in providing public goods. He finds that the lobbying efforts of environmental non-governmental organizations (ENGOs) are least pronounced in autocracies that are more likely to provide environmental public goods on their own (i.e., single-party regimes).

NEW FRONTIERS Country studies abound, and much research has coalesced around two authoritarian great powers, Russia (including its historical predecessor, the USSR) and especially China, the 'archetype' of authoritarian environmentalism. Currently, there are almost no studies that systematically distinguish between authoritarian archetypes when comparing environmental policies or their performance, taking into account past authoritarian legacies. Authoritarian collaboration and authoritarian learning regarding green politics are also under-explored topics.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Environmentalism and Authoritarianism, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Agostinis, G. and Urdinez, F., 2024. The nexus between authoritarian and environmental regionalism: An analysis of China's driving role in the Shanghai cooperation organization. In Sustainable Development, Regional Governance, and International Organizations, Obydenkova, A., ed., Routledge.

Ahlers, A.L. and Shen, Y., 2018. Breathe easy? Local nuances of authoritarian environmentalism in China's battle against air pollution. The China Quarterly, 234.

Albert, M.J., 2023. Ecosocialism for realists: Transitions, trade-offs, and authoritarian dangers. Capitalism Nature Socialism, 34:1.

Bagozzi, B.E., 2013. Strategies of environmental treaty participation by authoritarian regimes. Doctoral dissertation, Pennsylvania State University.

Beeson, M., 2010. The coming of environmental authoritarianism. Environmental Politics, 19:2.

Beeson, M., 2018. Coming to terms with the authoritarian alternative: The implications and motivations of China's environmental policies. Asia & the Pacific Policy Studies, 5:1.

Böhmelt, T., 2015. Environmental interest groups and authoritarian regime diversity. VOLUNTAS: International Journal of Voluntary and Nonprofit Organizations, 26.

Brain, S. and Pál, V., eds., 2019, Environmentalism under Authoritarian Regimes: Myth, Propaganda, Reality. Routledge.

Bruun, O. and Rubin, O., 2023. Authoritarian environmentalism – Captured collaboration in Vietnamese water management. Environmental Management, 71:3.

Bruun, O., 2020. Environmental protection in the hands of the state: authoritarian environmentalism and popular perceptions in Vietnam. The Journal of Environment & Development, 29:2.

Carlitz, R.D. and Povitkina, M., 2021. Local interest group activity and environmental degradation in authoritarian regimes. World Development, 142.

Castree, N. and Braun, B., 2001. Social Nature: Theory, Practice, and Politics. Blackwell.

Chen, K.W., 2019. Variety of authoritarian environmentalism: The case of water management in Singapore, China, and Vietnam. American Association for Chinese Studies, 24.

Chou, K., Hasegawa, K., Ku, D., and Kao, S.-F., eds., 2022. Air Pollution Governance in East Asia. Routledge.

Deutsch, S., 2021. Populist authoritarian neoliberalism in Brazil: making sense of Bolsonaro's anti-environment agenda. Journal of Political Ecology: case studies in history and society, 28:1.

Eaton, S. and Kostka G., 2024. Environmental Authoritarianism: A Critical Review. In The Oxford Handbook of Authoritarian Politics (in progress), Wolf, A., ed., Oxford University Press.

Enninga, J., 2023. Environmentalism, a flirt with eco-authoritarianism and the robustness of ordoliberalism. Constitutional Political Economy.

Falkner, R., 2021. Environmentalism and Global International Society. Cambridge University Press.

Fiorino, D.J., 2022. Democracies, Authoritarians, and Climate Change: Do Regime Types Matter? In How Democracy Survives, Holm, M. and Deese, R.S., eds., Routledge.

Horz, C.M., Marbach, M. and Steinert, C.V., 2023. Environmental pollution and authoritarian politics. The Journal of Politics, 85:2.

Jörgens, H., Knill and C., Steinebach, Y., eds., 2023. Routledge Handbook of Environmental Policy. Routledge.

Kantel, A.J., 2020. Fishing for power: incursions of the Ugandan authoritarian state. In Environmental Governance in a Populist/Authoritarian Era, McCarthy, J. ed., Routledge.

Koch, N., 2024. Authoritarian regimes and the environment. In Research Handbook on Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

Li, Y. and Shapiro, J., 2020. China Goes Green: Coercive Environmentalism for a Troubled Planet. Polity.

Lo, K., 2020. Ecological civilization, authoritarian environmentalism, and the eco-politics of extractive governance in China. The Extractive Industries and Society, 7:3.

Masyutina, O., Paustyan, E. and Yakovlev, G., 2023. Environmental Politics in Authoritarian Regimes: Waste Management in Russian Regions. Russian Politics, 8:3.

Mittiga, R., 2022. Political legitimacy, authoritarianism, and climate change. American Political Science Review, 116:3.

Plantan, E., 2018. Authoritarian Politics and Environmental Activism in Russia and China. Doctoral dissertation, Cornell University.

Von Stein, J., 2022. Democracy, autocracy, and everything in between: how domestic institutions affect environmental protection. British Journal of Political Science, 52:1.

Wang, Y., 2022. Authoritarian Environmentalism: A Discussion of China Planet: Ecological Civilization and Global Climate Governance. Human Rights Watch.

Wilson, R., 2020. Authoritarian environmental governance: Insights from the past century. In Environmental Governance in a Populist/Authoritarian Era, McCarthy, J. ed., Routledge.

Wu, F. and Martus, E., 2021. Contested environmentalism: the politics of waste in China and Russia. Environmental Politics, 30:4.

Zinda, J.A., 2023. Unpacking Authoritarian Environmental Governance: Gauging Authoritarian Elaboration in China and Beyond. Sociology of Development, 9:2.

Gender Equality & Authoritarian Regimes

Those in power have worked desperately hard over time to give the illusion of solidity to the gendered codes and hierarchies they invented.
– Angela Saini

Gender equality has long been a central issue in political, social, and economic discourse. While liberal democracies have made strides toward gender equality, authoritarian regimes often consolidate various forms of inequality, including gender-based disparities. However, the relationship between regime type and gender equality is complex. Some authoritarian regimes have actively promoted gender equality as a means to strengthen their rule, while others have reinforced traditional hierarchies. Even socialist regimes, which ideologically support gender equality, have shown uneven progress in this area. This multifaceted and non-linear development of gender equality across different political systems highlights the ongoing global struggle to achieve true parity between genders.

DEFINITION Gender equality refers to the normative ideal of different genders, predominantly (but problematically) defined in a binary way and encompassing the male and female gender, having and enjoying not only equal rights but also equal societal status (Kantola & Verloo 2018). It derives from the notion that gender inequality is not a product of unequal inherent intellectual and moral capabilities but of asymmetrical power relations between genders that have been historically established via ideologies, practices, institutions, and structures. These rationalize, legitimize, and perpetuate gender inequality and various forms of gender-based exploitation and exclusion for the material and psychological benefit of one gender (male) over the other (female). In the framework of the ideal of gender equality, different genders should play equal social roles and should equally participate in all central societal spheres (political, economic, social, cultural, legal, domestic/private, public, scientific, etc.) (Htun & Weldon 2010; Young 2000; Young & Allen 2012).

Concerning the foundational values and the functioning of their institutions in various societal spheres, nationally, internationally, and globally authoritarian (non/anti-democratic) regimes and gender equality are mostly not compatible. These regimes are built on and consolidate various inequalities, including gender inequality (Arendt 1951). In the majority of cases, historical and contemporary authoritarian regimes have a substantially worse record concerning gender equality compared to liberal representative democracies. Some variations of authoritarian regimes have explicitly stated and implemented policies that are not only an obstacle to reaching gender equality but are actively consolidating and strengthening inequality. But various contemporary authoritarian regimes have also implemented policies to advance gender equality in order to consolidate their regime (Bjarnegård & Donno 2023; Bush & Zetterberg 2023). On the other hand, some historical and contemporary authoritarian regimes, such as various variations of socialist regimes, were and are normatively based on gender equality and were historically concerning the rights, possibilities of women and their equality in various spheres at the forefront of the struggle for gender equality. But even in these countries, the progress regarding gender equality was not linear and was subjected to regressions (e.g., USSR under Stalin and China in later parts of Mao's reign) (Goldman 1989; Nazzari 1983).

But even concerning the situation in liberal democracies, the situation and developments regarding gender equality are not clear-cut. Substantial gender inequality and a mixed record regarding policies to achieve it can be observed in historical and contemporary liberal representative democracies. Hence, regardless of their formally different foundational values, modern politico-economic and social-political systems are generally characterized by various degrees of gender inequality despite global and national proclamations, agreements, strategies, and policies aimed at tackling gender inequality and despite the establishment of global and national public institutions specifically targeting this issue. Additionally, modern systems are characterized by a non-linear development of gender equality as the issue of continuously re-politicized and re-utilized in political struggles that can result in specific backsliding in the form of political movements and public policies that strive to abolish and/or curtail rights directly based on the ideal of gender equality and re-establish the 'natural' hierarchies between genders (Arruzza et al. 2019; Kantola & Verloo 2018; McWhorter 2009; Saini 2023).

SEE ALSO The concept of gender (in)equality is tightly connected with concepts (and phenomena) such as sexism, patriarchy, misogyny and right-wing politics and movements, often part of ideologies like Fascism, Nazism, racism and ultra-nationalism.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Scholars, activists and policymakers utilize the concept to identify, analyze and address specific central societal hierarchies and asymmetries of power among groups that are organized through gender categories in various modern and historical political regimes. It was and is utilized to interrogate and criticize the notions of 'God-given' and 'natural' hierarchies and stratifications derived from 'inherent' asymmetries in capabilities among gendered groups and to interrogate the discrepancies between normative ideals of a political regime and the reality of its functioning and effects.

ORIGIN Contemporary research on historical gender (in)equality, its genesis, causes, development, crucial processes, institutions, and practices that established and/or transformed or radically changed it in various human societies from various parts of the world demonstrates that there is no universality concerning gender relations, their fundamental characteristics and nature (Saini 2023). In various societies, gender differentiation did not play a central role in organizing and regulating social, political and economic relationships (Hodder 2004).

The research demonstrates that gender-unequal, patriarchal relations and structures are historically not inevitable and, although prevalent, cannot be understood as 'normal' or inevitable to the historical development of human societies. In particular, in non-European societies, the pre-colonial period was historically characterized by a stark variation in gender (in)equality that was tied to the choices made by these societies. Choices that were influenced but never simply (pre)determined by objective structural factors (e.g., development of agriculture) (Hays-Gilpin 2000). Modern European colonization and imperialism that subjugated most of the non-European world, the global expansion of capitalism and the nation-state form of political organization were the deciding factors in making gender unequal relations almost universal. These structural factors made these unequal gender relations appear inevitable and natural, while also establishing or/and strengthening gender hierarchies as fundamental instruments of power, societal organization and exploitation in the modern capitalist socio-political and politico-economic order(s) (Ghosh 2004; Saini 2023).

Neither the crucial Enlightenment thinkers on liberal and representative democracy nor the modern democratic societies up until the late nineteenth and early twentieth century believed in gender equality and either in thought or in practice excluded the female gender from full democratic citizenship and full participation in all spheres of society (McWhorter 2009; Yuval-Davis 1997). For those individuals categorized as women, modern democracies, at least up until they fought for and gained formal political, civic, and social rights, were a form of authoritarian regimes. Some researchers even argue that in the early modern period, gender hierarchies and discrimination of women in Western societies intensified (Federici 2004; Mies 2014).

The modern Western notion of gender equality originated in the thought of the early feminist Enlightenment thinkers such as Marie de Gournay (1565-1645), Mary Wollstonecraft (1759-1797) and Olympe de Gouges (1748-1793) and was from the late eighteenth and especially the nineteenth century taken up by various women's rights movements ranging from women worker's movements to bourgeois women's movements that addressed and fought for gender equality in various spheres of society (Patu 2017). It was as late as the late 1960s and 1970s that the first policies began to be formulated and introduced in Western democracies that strived to comprehensively address existing gender inequality in modern societies (Duchen 2003).

Concerning modern authoritarianism, there was a crucial division between the left socialist regimes and other forms of authoritarian regimes. While the former was ideologically subscribing to the notion of gender equality and initially implemented specific policies to achieve it (e.g., the right to divorce and reproductive rights) (Goldman 1989), the latter, in most cases, explicitly or implicitly subscribed to the notion of gender inequality and only later adopted the notion in the policies due to internal and international political pressure (Bjarnegård & Donno 2023).

LITERATURE Research on gender (in)equality in modern authoritarian regimes is diverse and has tackled various dimensions, and historical and geopolitical contexts. Researchers have focused on the historical development and transformation of gender (in)equality in various modern authoritarian regimes. In this context, they focused on the non-linear, dynamic, and ambivalent development of gender (in)equality in nominally socialist (left-wing) authoritarian regimes. Here, particular focus was directed to the zig-zag nature of the historical development of gender (in)equality in the Soviet Union as the first socialist country that adopted at the beginning of its existence the most progressive emancipatory policies for tackling gender inequality (e.g., broad reproductive rights), while later in the Stalinist era regressing and reintroducing more conservative policies (e.g., prohibition of abortion) and then in the post-Stalinist period partially reintroducing previous and implementing novel policies aimed at gender equality (Goldman 1989).

Similar research was done on China during the Maoist period, that was also characterized by uneven, ambivalent, and contradictory development of gender equality, despite the fact that women, in general, unprecedentedly improved their socio-political and political-economic position vis-à-vis men. Other historical socialist regimes were also analyzed concerning gender equality with mixed insights concerning the emancipatory nature of socialist regimes. While some regimes, such as the Castro regime in Cuba, were generally beneficial to the development of gender equality (Nazzari 1983), others, such as the Romanian socialist regime under N. Ceaușescu were detrimental and regressive concerning central aspects of gender equality (e.g., curtailment of reproductive rights) (Hord et al. 1991).

Historical fascist regimes in Italy, Germany, and Japan have also been the focus of research. Despite differences, these regimes shared some crucial similarities. They not only reaffirmed previous gender inequalities but also transformed them through the novel subjugation of women as healthy, fit, racially pure child factories, as submissive and hardworking, especially in the confines of their households. But these regimes also utilized women's labor in factories when needed during the entire war period of the regime's existence. However, these practices did not in any way change the subjugation of women under fascism nor improve their status (Gori 2016; Loroff 2011). Research concerning these regimes and gender inequality also extends to various populations that were by these regimes classified as abnormal, as racially, physically, and mentally inferior. The women in these populations were, in the name of 'racial purity' (cf. racism), subjected to even more brutal practices ranging from forced sterilization, euthanasia, ghettoization, slavery, and extermination (Kuhl 2002; Loroff 2011; McWhorter 2009).

Along with historical contexts, research has focused on contemporary authoritarian regimes and the complex nature of the issue of gender (in)equality. It has focused on specific geopolitical contexts ranging from authoritarian regimes in Africa, the Middle East, Central Asia, East and Southeast Asia and Eastern Europe and Latin America. The research focuses on specific case studies (e.g., Turkey, Russia, Mozambique) or a range of similar regimes (e.g., the Arab States) (Arat 2022; Bush & Gao 2017; Johnson 2016; Lorch & Bunk 2016).

Scholarship has focused on the identification and analysis of specific factors that affect the extent of gender (in)equality in these regimes, ranging from specific historical developments, religious beliefs, cultural patterns, politico-economic structures and transformations and various political, social, and economic crises. It demonstrated the non-linear, dynamic, and ambivalent nature of the development of gender equality in these regimes and their non-homogeneous treatment of specific women populations. Studies find that gender (in)equality in specific regimes differs for women belonging to a specific economic class and ethnicity, and in some cases, women in non-dominant groups experience a higher level of equality than those from the dominant groups (Bush & Zetterberg 2023; Choo 2020; Razavi & Jenichen 2010).

Other works have focused on various dimensions of gender (in)equality ranging from cultural attitudes in specific regimes concerning gender equality to gender equality concerning employment and education, healthcare to gender (in)equality in cyberspace and the (formal) political sphere (Bush & Zetterberg 2023; Guttenberg 2021). Concerning the political sphere, the research has focused on formal political representation and especially on the question and policy of quotas to increase women's participation and representation in political and other decision-making institutions. Here an interesting trend was observed as contemporary authoritarian regimes have instrumentalized the notion and politics of gender equality. They have increasingly implemented policies and reforms to strengthen women's rights (e.g., adoption of gender quotas and regulating hate speech) and are now at the forefront of gender equality initiatives. But their aim is not primarily to advance women's rights but to strengthen their rule and their position internationally (Bjarnegård & Donno 2023; Noh 2023).

Rwanda, under President Paul Kagame, purposely advanced women's rights to enhance external legitimacy: The country boasts the highest percentage of women in parliament globally, with over 60 percent of seats held by women. The regime uses this achievement to showcase its progressive policies. Domestically, it consolidates Kagame's power by appealing to a broad base and demonstrating effective governance. Internationally, it enhances Rwanda's image, attracting foreign aid and investment while deflecting criticism of its authoritarian practices.

Other research has focused on the complex and ambivalent relationship between neoliberal policies (privatization, social security cuts, liberalization) and gender (in)equality in authoritarian regimes, where there was a partial improvement concerning gender equality for affluent women and the worsening of the position and possibilities of marginalized women (Ludwig 2020).

An important set of contemporary research also focuses on the growing phenomenon of the backlash against gender equality and the policies, initiatives and movements that advance it in authoritarian regimes (Berry et al. 2021; Piscopo & Walsh 2020), a phenomenon that can also be observed and is growing in various Western liberal-democratic regimes (Kantola & Verloo 2018; Roggeband & Krizsán 2018).

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES One of the central methodological issues of existing research is the issue of reductive and problematic understanding of gender and, consequently, gender (in)equality. Gender is mostly understood as a stand-in for biological sex, as a nonproblematic, historically static inherent characteristic and essence of a part of the population. It rests on a simple binarism, a simple and clear division between men and women and on homogenizing experiences and interests of all that are perceived as belonging to one of these two categories. Hence, the insights of critical gender studies and intersectional studies are not being properly incorporated into existing research (see Kantola & Verloo 2018). The research being done in the former fields analyses gender as a political, socioeconomic and cultural construct and understands the heterogeneous interests and experiences of individuals in modern societies that are always affected by multiple systems of asymmetrical power relations (e.g., wealth, race, ethnicity, religion, ability).

Another important methodological issue is the issue of the Western 'imperial gaze' in the sense that the Western research perpetuates the imperial discourse and practices of Othering of non-Western societies where their situation concerning gender (in)equality is compared with an idealized and not actual occasionally rather similar situation in Western liberal democracies (see Farris 2017). For instance, the issue of backsliding concerning gender equality is universal and pertinent to a diverse set of regimes ranging from authoritarian to consolidated Western liberal representative democracies.

NEW FRONTIERS Due to the dynamic, nonlinear, ambivalent contemporary development of gender (in)equality in authoritarian regimes the issue will remain a highly relevant field of research. The research could become more interdisciplinary, utilizing critical insights from other fields, such as 'critical gender studies' and 'intersectionality studies.' Considering the intensification of the polycrisis (ecological, geopolitical, economic, political, identity) that will further destabilize global socio-political regimes, including authoritarian regimes, the issue of gender (in)equality will also remain a highly relevant policy field and a site of struggle concerning identity, hierarchies and the (re)distribution of wealth and power.

How to cite:

Vrečko Ilc, Blaž, 2025. Gender Equality and Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arat, Y., 2022. Democratic Backsliding and the Instrumentalization of Women's Rights in Turkey. Politics & Gender, 18:4.

Arendt, H., 1951. The origins of totalitarianism. Harcourt, Brace.

Arruzza, C., Bhattacharya, T. and Fraser, N., 2019. Feminism for the 99 percent: A manifesto. Verso.

Berry, M.E., Bouka, Y. and Kamuru, M.M., 2021. Implementing Inclusion: Gender Quotas, Inequality, and Backlash in Kenya. Politics & Gender, 17:4.

Bjarnegård, E. and Donno, D., 2023. Window-Dressing or Window of Opportunity? Assessing the Advancement of Gender Equality in Autocracies. Politics & Gender, 1:6.

Bush, S.S. and Gao, E., 2017. Small Tribes, Big Gains: The Strategic Uses of Gender Quotas in the Middle East. Comparative Politics, 49:2.

Bush, S.S. and Zetterberg, P., 2023. Gender Equality and Authoritarian Regimes: New Directions for Research. Politics & Gender, 1:5.

Choo, W., 2020. The kingdom of women: Life, love and death in China's hidden mountains. Tauris Parke.

Duchen, C., 2003. Women's Rights and Women's Lives in France 1944-1968 (1st ed). Taylor and Francis.

Farris, S. R., 2017. In the name of women's rights: The rise of femonationalism. Duke University Press.

Federici, S., 2004. Caliban and the witch. Autonomedia.

Ghosh, D., 2004. Gender and colonialism: Expansion or marginalization? The Historical Journal, 47:3.

Goldman, W., 1989. Women, the Family, and the New Revolutionary Order in the Soviet Union. In Promissory Notes: Women in the Transition to Socialism, Kruks, S., Rapp, R. and Blatt Young, M., eds., Monthly Review Press.

Gori, G., 2016. Italian Fascism and the Female Body: Sport, Submissive Women and Strong Mothers. Routledge.

Guttenberg, V., 2021. Rice Bunnies vs. the River Crab: China's Feminists, #MeToo, and Networked Authoritarianism. Flux: International Relations Review, 11:1.

Hays-Gilpin, K., 2000. Feminist Scholarship in Archaeology. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 571.

Hodder, I., 2004. Women and Men at Çatalhöyük. Scientific American, 290:1.

Hord, C., David, H.P., Donnay, F. and Wolf, M., 1991. Reproductive Health in Romania: Reversing the Ceausescu Legacy. Studies in Family Planning, 22:4.

Htun, M. and Weldon, S.L., 2010. When Do Governments Promote Women's Rights? A Framework for the Comparative Analysis of Sex Equality Policy. Perspectives on Politics, 8:1.

Johnson, J.E., 2016. Fast-Tracked or Boxed In? Informal Politics, Gender, and Women's Representation in Putin's Russia. Perspectives on Politics, 14:3.

Kantola, J. and Verloo, M., 2018. Revisiting gender equality at times of recession: A discussion of the strategies of gender and politics scholarship for dealing with equality. European Journal of Politics and Gender, 1:1-2.

Kuhl, S., 2002. The Nazi connection: Eugenics, American racism, and German national socialism. Oxford University Press.

Lorch, J. and Bunk, B., 2016. Gender Politics, Authoritarian Regime Resilience, and the Role of Civil Society in Algeria and Mozambique. German Institute of Global and Area Studies (GIGA).

Loroff, N., 2011. Gender and Sexuality in Nazi Germany. Constellations, 3:1.

Ludwig, G., 2020. The aporia of promises of liberal democracy and the rise of authoritarian politics. Distinktion: Journal of Social Theory, 21:2.

McWhorter, L., 2009. Racism and sexual oppression in Anglo-America: A genealogy. Indiana University Press.

Mies, M., 2014. Patriarchy and accumulation on a world scale: Women in the international division of labour. Bloomsbury Publishing.

Nazzari, M., 1983. The 'Woman Question' in Cuba: An Analysis of Material Constraints on Its Solution. Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society, 9:2.

Noh, Y., 2023. Public Opinion and Women's Rights in Autocracies. Politics & Gender, 1-5.

Patu, 2017. A brief history of feminism. MIT Press.

Piscopo, J.M. and Walsh, D.M., 2020. Introduction – Symposium: Backlash and the Future of Feminism. Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society, 45:2.

Razavi, S. and Jenichen, A., 2010. The Unhappy Marriage of Religion and Politics: Problems and pitfalls for gender equality. Third World Quarterly, 31:6.

Roggeband, C. and Krizsán, A., 2018. Reversing gender policy progress: Patterns of backsliding in Central and Eastern European new democracies. European Journal of Politics and Gender, 1:3.

Saini, A., 2023. The Patriarchs. Harper Collins UK.

Young, I.M., 2000. Inclusion and democracy. Oxford University Press.

Young, I.M. and Allen, D.S., 2012. Justice and the Politics of Difference. Princeton University Press.

Yuval-Davis, N., 1997. Women, Citizenship and Difference. Feminist Review, 57.

Box 7.5 LGBTQ+ Rights in Authoritarian Regimes

Better to be a dictator than gay
(Belarus' Alexander Lukashenko's reply to Germany's first openly gay minister after being called 'Europe's last dictator,' 2012)

Authoritarian regimes are typically opposed to supporting LGBTQ+ acceptance or legal inclusion. As authoritarian regimes do not recognize individual rights, they are also unlikely to recognize same-sex rights, and in some cases, the LGBTQ+ community is a direct target. In contrast, most democratic countries have constitutions that pledge to protect the basic rights of all citizens. Additionally, once the topic of same-sex marriages became a matter of debate, many democratic countries went on to pass same-sex marriages, with Denmark being the first country to recognize same-sex unions in 1989. As of 2022, 88% of full democracies recognized same-sex marriages or civil unions, compared to only 2% of authoritarian regimes. In fact, there are no authoritarian regimes that offer broad protections for LGBTQ+ rights.

While democracies do not provide the silver bullet for same-sex inclusion, studies have shown that they are much more likely to support LGBT rights – and the LGBTQ+ community has a better chance of advocating on their behalf in democracies than in authoritarian regimes. Authoritarian regimes usually do not offer their citizens civil liberties such as freedom of speech and press, which are important to exposing people to diverse ideas and experiences and creating more opportunities to hear alternative viewpoints. Democracies also offer their citizens freedom of association, which affords LGBTQ+ civil society groups to organize and advocate for their rights (Encarnación 2014). Democracies are also more likely to uphold the rule of law, which advocacy groups can use to mount legal action through the judicial system in support of the LGBTQ+ community (Encarnación 2014). For this reason, once communist authoritarian regimes fell in Eastern Europe, and these countries were experiencing a period of legal and political transformation, some organizations in Eastern Europe were able to get anti-gay laws rescinded.

For some new democracies, however, homophobia is engrained in both society and the state. As such, many countries are culturally disposed to be suspicious and unsupportive of non-traditional relationships and identities. Attacks are common against the LGBTQ+ community, and laws that target this community sometimes win widespread support from the public. Thus, autocratizing countries often target the LGBTQ+ community, not because they pose any threat to the incumbent regime but because these types of laws help build legitimacy for the state.

Anti-gay laws against men are more explicit and enforced. Although enforcement is usually focused on male homosexuality due to gender norms, lesbians also face systemic discrimination, police harassment, and lack of legal protections, and are similarly pressured into social invisibility.

For many authoritarian regimes, going after the LGBTQ+ community is tied to the politics of authoritarian survival. Russia's homophobic policies became more stringent after Vladimir Putin was 'elected' president for the second time in 2012. After facing protests due to the elections being deemed fraudulent, Putin faced a crisis of legitimacy and worked to construct narratives that would appeal to the traditional inklings of much of the Russian public.

Putin then proceeded to pass a series of laws that targeted the LGBTQ+ community, such as banning the dissemination of 'propaganda' that promoted non-traditional sexual relationships in 2013, on the pretext that this could negatively influence minors (Wilkinson 2020). Russia also has a gay propaganda law that bans children and teens from accessing information about sexual and gender minorities (Polsdofer 2014). It also prevents LGBTQ+ activists from assisting young people. That same year (2013), the Russian Duma cracked down further on offering custody to LGBT parents, giving the government the authority to terminate the parental rights of individuals raising children with a same-sex partner (note – as early as 2002, officials in the Russian Duma tried to make sodomy illegal (Wilkinson 2014)). Even if one parent is suspected of engaging in homosexual behavior, this could also prevent that couple from raising a child. In essence, homosexuality was treated as a pathology and on the same grounds for termination of parental rights as alcohol abuse, drug addiction and child abuse (Wilkinson 2020).

In 2020, Russia explicitly banned same-sex marriage in the constitution, and the following year, several LGBT organizations were designated as foreign agents or accused of spying and undermining social order. By 2023, Russia amended its propaganda law, outlawing the portrayal of non-traditional sexual relations for any age (Holt 2024). As part of Russia's traditional and family value-laden propaganda, passing these types of laws distracts from Russia's military losses and represents a defense against Western values and a rejection of universal human rights. Just prior to the Russian invasion of Ukraine, Putin remarked that LGBTQ+ rights have led to the degradation of society. Putin appealed to those who believed that families and children were in need of protection from immoral forces. Among other reasons, Putin also used this to construct a moral justification for invading Ukraine – that Russia was defending Ukraine from Western moral decay and European encroachment (Ayoub & Stoeckl 2024).

For many authoritarian states, the regimes construct their identity as rooted in certain national or religious traditions. Returning to the case of Russia, its anti-gay policies have coincided with the rise of the Russian Orthodox Church, which has accused the West of corrupting its children (Buyantueva 2017). After Putin's contested election in 2012, Putin strategically allied with the Church to improve his standing. It was the Orthodox Church in Russia that encouraged the violent dispersal of the gay pride parade in Moscow in 2011. The next year, Moscow City Council banned gay Pride parades for 100 years (Wilkinson 2014).

By 2012, 68% of Russians identified as religious (Buyantueva 2017: 470), and most Russian citizens approved of anti-gay policies. In 2015, a majority of Russians believed that homosexuals should be either eliminated or isolated from society (Levada-Center, 2015). Homosexuality is viewed as an illness or due to mental trauma. Furthermore, 91% of Russians said they did not know any homosexuals (Levada-Center, 2015).

Putin and other pro-Russian regimes have constructed a narrative where the biggest existential threats are coming from perverse Western values that will lead to the degradation of the family unit. Anti-gay rhetoric is often used as the rallying cry to mobilize traditionalists to the polls in favor of incumbent autocratic regimes. In Turkey, Recep Erdoğan also campaigned by accusing his opponent of being a supporter of LGBTQ+ rights. Homophobic populations help authoritarian regimes divide society into a base of traditional regime loyalists on the one hand and scapegoats, outsiders and morally corrupted opposition on the other (Ayoub & Stoeckl 2024).

In the case of Hungary, its leader, Viktor Orbán, attacked LGBTQ+ rights in order to build domestic support from its conservative citizens, calling the LGBTQ+ movement a destructive force in the country's moral crusade (Gera 2023). This was an easy target for Orbán as it deflected attention from his undemocratic power grabs and the country's economic woes. Attacking the LGBTQ+ community is an easy win for autocrats because it can be politically popular and poses little threat of pushback from this community, which is often already marginalized. Hungary ended legal gender recognition for transgender and intersex people. It has also amended the constitution to define marriage as a heterosexual union. The government also held a homophobic referendum that coincided with national election day in April. In 2021, Hungary passed a law banning the discussion of LGBTQ+ issues in schools and on children's television. These anti-gay laws have been influential, with Hungary's laws influencing Florida's Don't Say Gay laws (Williams Institute 2022).

LGBTQ+ rights are under attack anywhere where authoritarianism is on the rise. Tunisia notably democratized in 2012 only to backslide again towards authoritarianism in 2021. Though there was a surge in the number of civil society organizations following the Arab Spring, a Tunisian advocacy organization estimated that almost 3,000 individuals had been imprisoned in 2022 for violating Article 230 of the Penal code, which criminalizes homosexual activity and sees prison time of several years (Ayoub & Stoeckl 2024). The Tunisian police targeted LGBTQ+ activists and detained them without cause, searching their homes, torturing and assaulting them. Non-activists are also surveilled and arrested if the Tunisian authorities believe that they might be engaging in same-sex activities (Ayoub & Stoeckl 2024).

At the heart of these repressive political projects is the goal of abolishing human rights – and in particular, sexual freedoms and public expressions of identity and orientation. Right-wing populist authoritarians are using social media to spread disinformation about the LGBTQ+ community and how they are threatening children and causing a decay in family values (Ayoub & Stoeckl 2024). Anti-LGBTQ+ rights are part of an authoritarian right-wing strategy to instill fear in sexual and gender minorities (Crawford et al. 2016).

Some research has argued that any authoritarian regime that promotes exclusionary ideologies is more likely to frame sexual minorities as threats to the collective wellbeing and collective identities – and a threat to nationhood (Tschantret 2020). For example, in Cuba, the regime viewed homosexuality as subversive and a matter of national security. Gay men, in particular, were found them implicated by default in counter-revolutionary activities. In 1965, a national campaign against sexual minorities was conducted, with a special military unit established to identify gay men. Gays were placed in rehabilitation camps and traditional prisons, though deliberately placed in the worst wards with terrible living conditions (Tschantret 2020). Thus, revolutionary regimes that adhere to exclusionary ideologies are more likely to repress sexual minorities.

Colonialism has also mostly had a negative impact on gay rights, as colonial laws were often introduced to criminalize same-sex relations. In the Middle East and North Africa, French and British colonial powers implemented penal codes criminalizing homosexuality and sodomy. For example, the origin of Article 230 of the Tunisian Penal Code was based on colonial laws, as there was no mention of this in Tunisia's Ottoman Penal Code of 1861 (Anabtawi 2022). In Southeast Asia, Malaysia, Singapore and Myanmar inherited these types of laws and, as a legacy, continued to maintain them.

Ironically, years later, after many postcolonial authoritarian regimes in Africa inherited anti-gay laws and policies, their leaders embraced these laws while also proclaiming homosexuality to be a Western perversion (Kizito 2017). These laws have been justified on the grounds that homosexuality is an imposed Western behavior that needs to be stopped and LGBTQ+ people are a Western threat to public morality (Boryczka 2020). In Zimbabwe, Robert Mugabe called gays 'immoral' and claimed that they should be forbidden from having any rights. Cultural attitudes have been generally supportive of these tough measures on the LGBTQ+ community. Not surprisingly, in the case of Zimbabwe, the LGBTQ+ community has been the victim of physical attacks, and one of the noted civil society groups, GALZ, was declared illegal, and its leader was arrested on charges of sodomy (Manyonganise 2016).

In Uganda, the parliament passed its strictest anti-homosexuality bill in 2023. This law penalizes homosexuality but includes a new penalty called 'aggravated homosexuality', which comes with the death penalty or any same-sex acts involving people with disabilities and/or using drugs or alcohol. The bill goes even further by requiring people to report suspected acts of homosexuality, even family members. Kenya has proposed a similar bill to punish individuals with life imprisonment for same-sex acts (Shaw 2023). Ghana is also considering similar legislation to impose harsher sentences on those who engage in same-sex acts, which could include conversion therapy, which human rights organizations characterize as torture (cf. Box 7.6). Where sexual minorities are perceived as a product of Western and liberal threats to stability, regimes are more likely to persecute them (Comstock 2016)

Today, in some authoritarian countries, same-sex relationships are not directly banned, but the police are given free rein to target the LGBTQ+ community and crack down on those seen destroying social harmony. Singapore has noise violations as a pretext to raid businesses owned by gays. In Egypt, a floating gay nightclub called the Queen Boat was targeted in 2001, with 52 men charged with debauchery, and their names and workplace addresses were released (Anabtawi 2022). In Myanmar, the police arrest those who look suspicious after dark. In China, on the grounds of public order, local authorities often harass and target gay men (Chua 2022). While homosexuality is legal in Russia, there are no hate crime laws in place, resulting in one of the highest rates of murders of LGBT people in the world (Gay Travel Index 2018). Chechnya is one of the most dangerous places in the world for gay men. Gay men are tortured through electrocution, humiliated, and, in some cases, murdered (Kondakov 2019). Ramzan Kadyrov, head of the state of Chechen Republic (cf. regional governor), continues to insist that gays do not exist in Chechnya, but honor killings still take place (Loriga 2020). Though Tunisia agreed to the UN Human Rights Council's recommendation to prohibit the use of forced anal exams, the police continue to use this type of torture (Saral 2019).

Given the tough landscape for LGBTQ+ activists, what recourse do these groups have in authoritarian regimes? LGBTQ+ activists in authoritarian regimes can try to challenge existing penal codes, such as repealing anti-sodomy laws and trying to leverage international pressure to extract policy concessions. They can try to use strategic litigation to challenge specific cases rather than seek wholesale legislative reforms. They can also just focus on raising awareness and networking with other allies. In the case of Rwanda, activists were able to successfully oppose Article 2017, which would criminalize same-sex activities by developing a non-confrontational strategy to work within the political system. There is a very narrow area of what types of activism authoritarian systems will accept (Paszat 2022). LGBTQ+ movements are better off avoiding large-scale confrontations due to their precarious status and engaging in pragmatic forms of resistance (Chua 2022). They can also rely on meeting at international human rights conferences to share strategies and tactics. In spite of these best efforts, authoritarian regimes pose significant hurdles to civil society and LGBTQ+ organizations.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. LGBTQ+ Rights in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Anabtawi, S., 2022. Snatching Legal Victory: LGBTQ Rights Activism and Contestation in the Arab World. Arab Law Quarterly, 36:4-5.

Ayoub, P. and Stoeckl, K., 2024. The Global Resistance to LGBTIQ Rights. Journal of Democracy, 35:1.

Boryczka, J.M., 2020. Attitudes Toward LGBT People and Rights in Africa. In Oxford Research Encyclopedia of Politics.

Buyantueva, R., 2018. LGBT rights activism and homophobia in Russia. Journal of Homosexuality, 65:4.

Chua, L.J., 2022. LGBTQ Rights Mobilization and Authoritarianism. In Legal Mobilization for Human Rights, de Búrca, G., Oxford University Press.

Comstock, A.L., 2016. Gay rights and US foreign aid: a look at Nigeria and Uganda. The Journal of International Relations, Peace Studies, and Development, 2:1.

Crawford, J.T., Brandt, M.J., Inbar, Y. and Mallinas, S.R., 2016. Right-wing authoritarianism predicts prejudice equally toward "gay men and lesbians" and "homosexuals". Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 111:2.

Encarnación, O.G., 2014. Gay rights: Why democracy matters. Journal of Democracy, 25.

Gera, M., 2023. "Here, the Hungarian people will decide how to raise our children": Populist rhetoric and social categorization in Viktor Orbán's anti-LGBTQ campaign in Hungary. New Perspectives, 31:2.

Holt, E., 2024. Experts warn of health harms of Russia's anti-LGBT ruling. The Lancet, 403:10423.

Kizito, K., 2017. Bequeathed legacies: Colonialism and state led homophobia in Uganda. Surveillance & Society, 15:3/4.

Kondakov, A., 2019. Chechnya, detention camps, Global Encyclopedia of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, and Queer (LGBTQ) History.

Levada-Center, 2015. Levada Analytical Center.

Loriga, D.V., 2020. LGBT Rights in Russia: The 'Gay Propaganda' Law and Its Consequences in Chechnya. Bellarmine Law Society Review, 11:1.

Manyonganise, M., 2016. 'We will chop their heads off': Homosexuality versus religio-political grandstanding in Zimbabwe. In Public religion and the politics of homosexuality in Africa. Routledge.

Pascale, C.M., 2019. The weaponization of language: Discourses of rising right-wing authoritarianism. Current Sociology, 67:6.

Paszat, E., 2022. Organizing under pressure: authoritarianism, respectability politics, and LGBT advocacy in Rwanda. Social Movement Studies.

Polsdofer, S., 2014. Pride and prejudiced: Russia's anti-gay propaganda law violates the European Convention on Human Rights. American University International Law Review, 29:5.

Saral, M., 2019. The Protection of Human Rights in Transitional Tunisia: Capacity, Willingness and Capacity-Building. Muslim World Journal of Human Rights, 16:1.

Shaw. A., 2023. The global assault on LGBTQ rights undermines democracy. Chatham House.

Tschantret, J., 2020. Revolutionary homophobia: Explaining state repression against sexual minorities. British Journal of Political Science, 50:4.

Wilkinson, C., 2014. Putting "traditional values" into practice: The rise and contestation of anti-homo-propaganda laws in Russia. Journal of Human Rights, 13:3.

Wilkinson, C., 2020. LGBT rights in the former Soviet Union. The Oxford handbook of global LGBT and sexual diversity politics.

Williams Institute, 2022. What Anti-LGBT Politics in the U.S. Means for Democracy at Home and Abroad. UCLA School of Law.

Human Rights under Authoritarianism

Dictatorships have fallen; democracy has spread. But human rights face growing challenges today – and no country is immune.
– António Guterres, UN Secretary-General (2020)

Human rights in authoritarian regimes sounds like an oxymoron – as promoting human rights is usually not a huge priority for dictatorships. However, the application and enforcement of upholding human rights varies significantly from country to country, and not all authoritarian regimes commit gross human rights violations.

Human rights constitute a set of norms governing the treatment of individuals and groups which are supposed to be grounded in ethical principles of what is considered to be fundamental for living a decent life. Most scholarship on human rights from Europe and North America dates modern human rights theory and practice from the Enlightenment period onward (Ferrone 2017).

While there are many different types of human rights, much scholarly attention has focused on civil and political rights – the rights that feature prominently in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which was established in 1948. These rights can be further divided into several categories: physical integrity rights (right to life and freedom from political killings, freedom from torture, disappearance and slavery); individual integrity and empowerment rights (freedom of movement, residence, thoughts, beliefs, expression, privacy, assembly, association); and finally, administration of justice rights (right to a fair trial, equality before the law, freedom from arbitrary arrest or detention).

Though the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was supposed to be considered universal, critics from non-Western countries pushed back that these rights did not take into account cultural differences and did not adequately account for economic and social rights, as highlighted in the 1993 Bangkok Declaration (Davis 1995). These rights included the right to work, the right to work in just and favorable conditions, the right to health, the right to education, and freedom from poverty, want and need. Xi Jinping of China has declared that China has blazed a path for human rights development that is consistent with the country's conditions (Zhang 2022). Indeed, in terms of economic rights, China has lifted hundreds of millions of people out of poverty. The country also carries out thousands of executions each year, making it the world's leading executioner (Death Penalty Information Centre 2022). Beyond its high execution rate, China has also imprisoned over one million Uyghurs and subjected those not detained to forced labor, surveillance and sterilization (Maizland 2022).

Many autocrats are fairly defensive when they are critiqued about their human rights records. For example, Egyptian President Abdel-Fattah el-Sisi declared in response to criticisms of the regime's crackdown on civil liberties that Western human rights didn't apply to Egypt (Samuels 2016). True, there are different norms and domestic conditions facing countries around the world that may require different approaches. Ultimately, though human rights are norms and context-specific, protests from autocrats about the Western origin of human rights are usually more of a pretext to avoid having to comply with them.

In spite of the criticisms that the study of human rights may be Western-centric (Mutua 2002), the most common way that scholars measure human rights is to look at repression levels (Bagozzi et al. 2021; Poe 2019; Tanneberg 2020). Repression is one of the more universal ways to measure human rights violations – as it captures violations to freedom of expression, press, beliefs, association, life, freedom from torture and unlawful killings, and the security of persons. Much of the literature has measured human rights violations by looking at violations of physical integrity (Armstrong 2009), but some scholars also use violations of civil liberties, such as censorship and the suspension of basic political rights (Davenport 2007; Escribà-Folch 2013). Scholars can also turn to measure human rights violations by looking at Freedom House Scores, the Human Rights Protection Scores and the Varieties of Democracy Political Civil Liberties Index as indicators for violence and restrictions. Another common measurement is the Political Terror Scale, which looks at political imprisonment, torture, political murder and the scale of terror used to achieve the regime's political objectives (Nordås & Davenport 2013). It's important to note that all of these measures are continuous measures of repression, and the measurement of human rights violations is usually categorized by degree and not based on any sort of categorical measurement.

Repression is used by authorities to deter specific activities and beliefs perceived as threatening to political order and to punish those who are committing activities that may threaten the state. Research has demonstrated that regime type is among the most important determinants of repression levels – or human rights violations (Hill & Jones 2014; Davenport & Appel 2014). Democracies are far less likely to engage in repression, a pattern that is sometimes referred to as the 'domestic democratic peace.' Why is this the case? In authoritarian regimes, repressive leaders cannot be voted out through elections, which means that they can engage in human rights violations without facing consequences at the ballot box.

Although research shows that repression is far more prevalent – in both severity and incidence – in dictatorships than in democracies (Poe & Tate 1994; Poe et al. 1999; Vreeland 2008), some research argues that the relationship between regime type and repression is non-linear (Fein 1995; Gartner & Regan 1996) and there is 'more murder in the middle.' In other words, hybrid regimes (neither fully autocratic nor fully democratic), anocracies and transitioning regimes are more likely to be repressive.

Given how critical human rights are to human wellbeing, improving human rights remains important. In spite of the tensions created by criticizing dictators on their human rights records, naming and shaming may have some impact. A study looking at over 800 challenges to countries in Latin America from 1981 to 1995, found that human rights criticisms do lead to some short-term reduction to repression, particularly in countries that have strong economic ties to other countries (Franklin 2008). Another study demonstrated that when the United Nations Human Rights Council engages in naming and shaming of specific human rights violations this can weaken the target government and increase the costs of repression (DeMeritt & Conrad 2019). However, the same study notes that regimes may cease one type of violation only to increase the use of other types of human rights violations. Thus, in spite of these challenges posed, naming and shaming is not a worthless endeavor. Transnational Advocacy Networks can bring attention to human rights violations, pressure governments, and impact public opinion, which may eventually lead to meaningful change (Morrison 2024).

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Human Rights under Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Armstrong II, D.A., 2009. Measuring the democracy–repression nexus. Electoral Studies, 28:3.

Bagozzi, B.E., Berliner, D. and Welch, R.M., 2021. The diversity of repression: Measuring state repressive repertoires with events data. Journal of Peace Research, 58:5.

Davenport, C. and Appel, B., 2014. Stopping state repression: An examination of spells 1976-2004. APSA, 2014 Annual Meeting Paper.

Davis, M.C., 1995. Human rights in Asia: China and the Bangkok declaration. Buffalo Journal of International Law, 2.

Death Penalty Information Centre, 2022. Executions Around the World.

DeMeritt, J.H. and Conrad, C.R., 2019. Repression substitution: Shifting human rights violations in response to UN naming and shaming. Civil Wars, 21:1.

Escribà-Folch, A., 2013. Repression, political threats, and survival under autocracy. International Political Science Review, 34:5.

Fein, H., 1995. Life-integrity Violations and Democracy in the World, 1987. Human Rights Quarterly, 17:1.

Ferrone, V., 2017. The rights of history: Enlightenment and human rights. Human Rights Quarterly, 39.

Franklin, J.C., 2008. Shame on you: The impact of human rights criticism on political repression in Latin America. International Studies Quarterly, 52:1.

Gartner, S.S. and Regan, P.M., 1996. Threat and repression: The non-linear relationship between government and opposition violence. Journal of Peace Research, 33:3.

Hill, D.W. and Jones, Z.M., 2014. An empirical evaluation of explanations for state repression. American Political Science Review, 108:3.

Maizland, L.S., 2022. China's Repression of Uyghurs in Xinjiang. Council on Foreign Relations.

Morrison, K., 2024. Named and Shamed: International Advocacy and Public Support for Repressive Leaders. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 68:2-3.

Mutua, M., 2002. Human rights: A political and cultural critique. University of Pennsylvania Press.

Nordås, R. and Davenport, C., 2013. Fight the youth: Youth bulges and state repression. American Journal of Political Science, 57:4.

Poe, S.C., 2019. The decision to repress: An integrative theoretical approach to the research on human rights and repression. In Understanding human rights violations. Routledge.

Poe, S.C. and Tate, C.N., 1994. Repression of human rights to personal integrity in the 1980s: A global analysis. American Political Science Review, 88:4.

Poe, S.C., Tate, C.N. and Keith, L.C., 1999. Repression of the human right to personal integrity revisited: A global cross-national study covering the years 1976-1993. International Studies Quarterly, 43:2.

Samuels, G., 2016. Egyptian president says 'Western' human rights don't apply to his country. The Independent.

Tanneberg, D., 2020. How to Measure Dictatorship, Dissent, and Political Repression. The Politics of Repression Under Authoritarian Rule: How Steadfast is the Iron Throne?

Vreeland, J.R., 2008. The effect of political regime on civil war: Unpacking anocracy. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 52:3.

Zhang, Y., 2022. General Secretary Xi Jinping's Important Statements on Respecting and Protecting Human Rights Are Integral Parts of Xi Jinping Thought on Socialism with Chinese Characteristics for a New Era. Journal of Human Rights, 21.

Box 7.6 Torture

Torture is senseless violence, born in fear (...)
Torture costs human lives but does not save them.
Torture makes torturers.
– Jean-Paul Sartre, A Victory, 1958

Torture is a specific technique of causing pain in order to obtain information and punish or intimidate others. Different definitions of torture exist – some limiting torture to those in power, like the UN Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman, or Degrading Treatment or Punishment (UN 1984; Collard 2018), while others also include those who struggle against those in power and other non-governmental armed groups, organized crime etc. (Hajjar 2013).

Torture is defined by the UN (1984) Convention as: "any act by which severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, is intentionally inflicted on a person for such purposes as obtaining from him or a third person information or a confession, punishing him for an act he or a third person has committed or is suspected of having committed, or intimidating or coercing him or a third person, or for any reason based on discrimination of any kind when such pain or suffering is inflicted by or at the instigation of or with the consent or acquiescence of a public official or other person acting in an official capacity. It does not include pain or suffering arising only from, inherent in or incidental to lawful sanctions."

Einolf (2007: 103) provides a slightly narrower definition of torture as "an act in which severe physical pain is intentionally inflicted on a person by a public official while that person is under the custody or control of that official, where there has not been, or has not yet been, a formal finding of guilt."

Torture has been present since ancient times (Langbein 1977; Hajjar 2013). For an overview of the history, different techniques and types of torture that have been used, see Hassner 2022; Foucault 2019; Hajjar 2013: 14-32; Wisnewsky 2010: 16-48. Torture has been used, as already Foucault (2019) observed, as a way for the ruling groups to publicly show the strength of the regime, to set an example and possible consequences for those not complying with the rules and interests of those in power (see also: Blakeley 2007; 2010; Wilson 2019). Torture, although it may be efficient in the long-term in securing political goals, always undermines the legitimacy and support for the specific regime in power while fueling stronger opposition (Hassner 2022: 132).

There was a significant decline in the use of torture during the nineteenth century. However, the twentieth century saw a notable resurgence. Einolf (2007) attributed this rise to several factors: the growing number and scale of wars, the intensification of ethnic, racial, and religious conflicts within societies, and the development of more effective tools for detecting treason – a crime historically punished by torture. Rejali (1994), focusing on the case of Iran, argued that rather than disappearing in the context of modernity, torture merely evolved, taking on new forms.

According to Blakeley (2007), three distinct narratives or models are commonly used to explain the use of torture: (A) security, (B) stability, and (C) legitimacy. The security model (A) frames torture as a tool for ensuring security, often justified by the need to extract intelligence to prevent threats, such as in the 'ticking bomb' scenario. This rationale dominates public debates, but Blakeley argues that very few cases of torture align with this framework. Instead, most instances of torture are not directly linked to obtaining actionable intelligence but serve other purposes.

The stability model (B) views torture as a mechanism for maintaining regime stability. Within this framework, torture is employed by governing elites to suppress opposition and instill fear among potential dissenters. However, Blakeley notes that while torture may provide short-term stability, it often spirals out of control and becomes widespread, as documented by scholars like Chomsky & Herman (1979a/b) and Stokes (2003; 2005). Furthermore, in the long term, regimes relying on torture risk fueling resistance, particularly from exiled dissidents. Hassner (2022: 132) underscores this point: "Torture is costly in the medium to long term. While it might provide some tactical advantage by providing information that can win battles, its strategic costs may lose the war."

Liberal democratic states typically invoke the legitimacy model (C) to justify the use of torture. In this narrative, torture is framed as a necessary evil in the defense of higher ideals like freedom and liberty. States assign specific identities to those subjected to torture – labeling them as terrorists or security threats – to legitimize their actions. Blakeley (2007) highlights how this model intertwines with liberal values to rationalize practices that would otherwise be condemned, a point also explored by Devetak (2005) and Jackson (2005). Note that Blakeley emphasizes that these models are not mutually exclusive but often overlap and reinforce one another in practice.

Although torture is often associated with totalitarianism (Saluppo 2020; Eley 2013; Albanese & Knipe 2019; Sofsky 1997; McLoughlin & McDermott 2002), it is, in fact, a common feature across various types of non-democratic regimes. Torture, alongside other forms of state repression such as mass killings, extrajudicial executions, and arbitrary detentions, is typically linked to dictatorships and personalist rule (Geddes et al. 2018; Jackson et al. 2010; Claridge 1996; Lopez 1984; Sloan 1984).

Dictatorial regimes are particularly explicit in their use of physical violence to enforce compliance with the rulers' will. These regimes are also among the most egregious violators of human rights, often employing brutal methods to maintain control. As Vreeland (2008: 73) observes, "Dictators generally have no interest in violence that leaves no marks; intimidation can require that they leave bloody traces of their power in every public square." This reflects the overt and performative nature of violence in these systems, where the visible display of brutality serves as a tool of intimidation and control – cf. Terror in Box 3.13.

While authoritarian regimes may formally sign international agreements and conventions prohibiting torture, they frequently continue to employ it in practice (Vreeland 2008). This contradiction highlights the gap between their rhetorical commitments and their actual behavior, underscoring the persistent role of torture as a mechanism of repression in non-democratic governance.

Keith (2012) and Davenport (2007b) argue that military regimes are more likely to engage in torture and other forms of physical repression because such practices align with their institutional familiarity and operational methods. Davenport's analysis of state repression from 1976 to 1996 underscores the significance of regime type, revealing that single-party regimes are the least repressive, while military regimes are the most prone to employing torture and mass killings (Davenport 2007b).

However, subsequent research complicates this view. Svolik (2012), Dragu & Przeworski (2019), Gregory (2009), and Greitens (2016) demonstrate that military regimes often delegate the implementation of torture and other forms of physical repression to specialized security agencies rather than relying on the military itself. This distinction highlights the institutional mechanisms through which repression is carried out in such regimes.

Alemán (2023) further explores variations in the tools of oppression across different authoritarian regime types. His findings suggest that 'real' socialist regimes generally refrained from extensive use of torture and killings, whereas military regimes, lacking broader legitimacy, were more inclined to resort to such methods. While some infamous examples of state terror and torture occurred under communist regimes – such as Stalin's Soviet Union or Kampuchea (Cambodia) under Pol Pot – these cases were exceptions often tied to highly personalist rule. In contrast, torture was more openly and extensively used by military regimes compared to other regime types, including democratic systems, monarchies, multi-party autocracies, and both communist and non-communist single-party regimes (Alemán 2023: 289).

While torture is often associated with authoritarian regimes, it is important to acknowledge its presence too in democracies, particularly during wartime or in the pursuit of higher ideological ends. As Einolf (2007: 106) notes, "While liberal democratic states use torture against their own citizens much less often than other states, liberal democracy does not by itself guarantee that torture and other forms of violence will not occur." This tension became especially evident following the 9/11 attacks, when US government agencies engaged in torture techniques as part of the 'War on Terror,' exemplified by abuses at Abu Ghraib, Guantánamo Bay, and CIA black sites (Hajjar 2013; Greenberg 2005; Williams 2006).

Historically, democracies have justified the use of torture by invoking security narratives similar to those employed by authoritarian regimes. For example, France's use of torture during the conflicts in Indochina and Algeria, as documented by Vidal-Naquet (1963), demonstrates how democracies have rationalized such practices in the name of national security. However, there is a key distinction between the narratives of democratic and authoritarian regimes. While authoritarian regimes openly justify torture through security rationales without concern for legal or moral opposition, liberal democracies officially oppose torture based on human rights and legal norms. Nevertheless, when democracies engage in torture, they often adopt the same security justifications, framing it as a necessary response to existential threats (Blakeley 2007: 374-375).

This duality highlights a troubling contradiction within liberal democratic states. Despite their commitments to international conventions prohibiting torture, such as the UN Convention Against Torture, they have, at times, created pseudo-legal frameworks to enable its use during crises. This raises serious questions about the means employed by democracies to achieve their goals and how these practices align with their professed values of human rights and the rule of law.

Although it has been a general belief that liberal democratic countries do not engage in torture, the practice shows a different account. Namely, besides the use for internal security reasons, as rationalized, they also tend to support authoritarian regimes and their torture practices in order to secure their own and international elite interests: "Despite the assumption that torture tends not to be used by liberal states, the reality is that liberal states do use torture through transnational networks of terror that they establish in collaboration with elites in authoritarian states, in the interests of their own and global elites" (Blakeley 2007: 375).

The US, as the democratic ideal presented in the media and also within scholarly research, has, throughout the twentieth century, supported many autocratic military regimes and their forms of repression – including torture – in order to secure their interests. This has been best seen in Latin America, the 'Operation Condor,' support for the military junta and Pinochet in Chile etc, but also in other parts of the world. (Chomsky & Herman 1979a/b; Brown 1985; Dinges 2004; Goerge, 2004; McSherry 2005; 2007; Blakeley 2007; Policzer 2009; Bevins 2020).

How to cite:

Hočevar, Marko, 2025. Torture, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Alemán, J.A., 2023. The dictator's dilemma: Why communist regimes oppress their citizens while military regimes torture and kill. Journal of Human Rights, 22:3, Albanese, G. and Knipe, S., 2019. The March on Rome: Violence and the Rise of Italian Fascism. Routledge.

Bevins, V., 2020. The Jakarta method: Washington's anticommunist crusade and the mass murder program that shaped our world. PublicAffairs.

Blakeley, R., 2007. Why torture? Review of International Studies, 33: 3.

Blakeley, R., 2010. State terrorism in the social sciences: Theories, methods, and concepts. In Contemporary state terrorism: Theory and practice, Jackson, R., Murphy, E. and Poynting, S., eds., Routledge.

Brown, C. 1985. With Friends Like These: The Americas Watch Report on Human Rights and US Policy in Latin America. Pantheon Books.

Chomsky, N. and E. Herman, 1979a. The Washington Connection and Third World Fascism: The Political Economy of Human Rights, vol. I. South End Press.

Chomsky, N. and E. Herman, 1979b. After the Cataclysm. Postwar Indochina and the Reconstruction of Imperial Ideology. The Political Economy of Human Rights, vol. II. South End Press.

Davenport, C., 2007a. State repression and the domestic democratic peace. Cambridge University Press.

Davenport, C., 2007b. State repression and the tyrannical peace. Journal of Peace Research, 44: 4.

Devetak, R., 2005. The Gothic Sense of International Relations: Ghosts, Monsters, Terror and the Sublime after September 11. Review of International Studies, 31:4.

Dinges, J., 2004. The Condor years: How Pinochet and his allies brought terrorism to three continents. The New Press.

Dragu, T. and Przeworski, A., 2019. Preventive repression: Two types of moral hazard. American Political Science Review, 113: 1.

Einolf, C.J. 2007. The Fall and Rise of Torture: A Comparative and Historical Analysis. Sociological Theory 25: 2.

Eley, G., 2013. Nazism as Fascism. Violence, Ideology, and the ground of consent in Germany 1930-1945. Routledge.

Escriba-Folch, A., 2013. Repression, political threats, and survival under autocracy. International Political Science Review, 34:5.
Foucault, M., 2019. Discipline and punish. The Birth of the Prison. Penguin books.
Geddes, B., Wright, J., and Frantz, E., 2018. How dictatorships work: Power, personalization, and collapse. Cambridge University Press.
George, A., 2004. State Terrorism and the United States: From Counterinsurgency to the War on Terrorism. Zed Books.
Greenberg, K.J. 2005. The Torture Papers: The Road to Abu Ghraib. Cambridge University Press.
Greitens, S.C., 2016. Dictators and their secret police: Coercive institutions and state violence. Cambridge University Press.
Hajjar, L., 2013. Torture: A sociology of violence and human rights. Routledge.
Hassner, R.E. 2022. Anatomy of Torture. Cornell University Press.
Jackson, R. 2005. Writing the War on Terrorism: Language, Politics and Counter-Terrorism. Manchester University Press.
Keith, L.C., 2012. Political repression: Courts and the law. University of Pennsylvania Press.
Langbein, J.H., 1977. Torture and the Law of Proof: Europe and England in the Ancièn Regime. University of Chicago Press McLoughlin, B., and K. McDermott, eds., 2002. Stalin's Terror. High Politics and Mass Repression in the Soviet Union. Palgrave Macmillan.
McSherry, J. P., 2005. Predatory states: Operation Condor and covert war in Latin America. Rowman & Littlefield.
McSherry, J. P., 2007. Death squads as parallel forces: Uruguay, Operation Condor, and the United States. Journal of Third World Studies, 24: 1.
Policzer, P., 2009. The rise and fall of repression in Chile. University of Notre Dame Press.
Rejali, Darius. 1994. Torture and Modernity: Self, Society and State in Modern Iran. Westview Press.
Rejali, Darius. 2007. Torture and Democracy. Princeton University Press.
Saluppo, A., 2020. Paramilitary Violence and Fascism: Imaginaries and Practices of Squadrismo, 1919-1925. Contemporary European History, 29
Sofsky, W., 1997. The Order of Terror. The Concentration Camp. Princeton University Press.
Svolik, M., 2012. The politics of authoritarian rule. Cambridge University Press.
UN, 1984. Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment. United Nations, 1465. UN General Assembly.
Vidal-Naquet, P., 1963. Torture: Cancer of Democracy. Penguin books.
Vreeland, J.R., 2008. Political Institutions and Human Rights: Why Dictatorships Enter into the United Nations Convention Against Torture, International organization, 62:1
Williams, K. 2006. American Methods: Torture and the Logic of Domination. South End Press.
Wilson, T., 2019. State terrorism. In The Oxford handbook of terrorism, Chenoweth, E., English, R., Gofas, A. and Kalyvas, S.N., eds., Oxford University Press.
Wisnewsky, J.J., 2010. Understanding Torture. Edinburgh University Press.
Wolfendale, J. 2007. Torture and the Military Profession. Palgrave Macmillan.

Narco-States

Virtually every single illegal drug-producing and/or drug-trafficking country in the world has one day or another been referred to as a narco-state.
– Pierre-Arnaud Chouvy

The common feature of so-called narco-states relates to the substantial influence exerted by the illicit drug trade over their political, economic, and social institutions. Yet, whilst increasingly invoked by policymakers, law enforcement agents, political leaders, journalists and scholars, the term narco-state lacks a clear definition. Applied more as a label than a precise analytical framework, the term narco-state serves as a rhetorical device and political tool to legitimize and enact particular policies in the context of contemporary global relations.

DEFINITION Despite its use across a variety of settings, from international policy-making and law enforcement to journalism and academia, and its growing familiarity as a common term in popular and political discourse, the concept of narco-state lacks any precise definition. The term is broadly used to describe contexts where drug-related activities and organizations wield considerable power over state institutions, gravely impacting the state's ability to govern, as well as its domestic and international standing. Yet those states that have attracted this label vary considerably in terms of geography, history and pervasiveness of the illicit drugs trade. They can be found across the globe, from Latin America to Africa and Asia to Europe. The extent of the narcotics trade and its specific role in shaping these states' respective social, political and economic trajectories similarly varies widely. Thus, while the designation of a country as a narco-state implies some degree of influence by the trade on a state's governance, there is little consensus on the level of that influence.

Drawing on political economy theories, Chouvy (2015) suggests several parameters to understand the scope of the phenomenon and assess would-be candidates for the designation: the proportion of the drug economy relative to the country's overall economy; the drug economy's share of GDP; the surface area occupied by illicit crops compared to other crops and arable land; the degree of active involvement of the state apparatus in the illicit drug trade; the territorial control exerted by the state over areas of drug production (as opposed to merely tolerating non-state actors' activities); and the degree of corruption deriving from drug trafficking organizations penetrating state institutions. Yet, assessments rely heavily on estimates, given the considerable difficulty in finding trustworthy data, and on subjective interpretations of what is considered a substantial proportion in each of these diverse criteria. Chouvy (2015), for instance, ultimately concludes that no contemporary state fully qualifies. Countries often labeled as narco-states, such as Afghanistan and North Korea, typically lack primary economic dependence on drugs, government sponsorship of drug production as an official policy, or territorial control, as non-state actors frequently drive their drug economies in areas beyond state rule. In other accounts, however, it is precisely that challenge to a state's governance that is key: a narco-state, in this case, is merely a failed state (cf. state fragility & failure) where the illegal drug trade plays some kind of substantial role.

Rather than capturing a specific phenomenon, the term tends to oversimplify complex social realities, brushing over specificities that make each case distinct. Discursive power, not analytical precision, lies behind the term's currency: easily instrumentalized, the label imposes a representation inviting particular responses, as discussed below.

SEE ALSO The term operates alongside 'rentier state' in analogy with 'petro-state,' although rents from illegal drugs never reach the same levels of revenue as fossil fuels (see also: resource curse). Therefore, the phenomenon is closer to the concepts of 'failed state' and specifically 'mafia state,' 'criminal state,' or 'narco-economy.' The terms 'narcokleptocracy' (kleptocracy) and 'narco-terrorism' usually orbit polities branded as narco-states.

ORIGIN Kingsberg (2013) identifies Manchukuo (満州国 – Manshūkoku), the Japanese puppet state in Manchuria in northeast China from 1932 to 1945, as one of the world's first narco-states. During this period, the drug trade assumed a central role, determining the territory's finances, international position, and even its residents' social categories. Drug use, Kinsberg (2013: 76) writes, was a "more useful signifier of race than race itself," mapping onto racial hierarchies between Chinese, Japanese, and Koreans.

The Japanese Kwantung Army (関東軍 – Kantōgun), which controlled Manchukuo, actively promoted the cultivation and distribution of opium as a means to generate revenue and control local populations. The opium trade was institutionalized through state monopolies that were officially sanctioned by the Japanese authorities. This system not only provided financial resources to support Japan's military and colonial ambitions but also helped undermine resistance to Japanese rule by fostering addiction among local populations. Although the actual network was much larger, spanning other Japan-controlled territories like Formosa (Taiwan) and Korea, Manchukuo became notorious for its role in the illicit drug trade, which sparked international criticism and was later cited during post-war tribunals as evidence of Japan's exploitation of narcotics for imperial purposes (Jennings 1995; Smith 2005; Kingsberg 2012).

If Manchukuo was a narco-state avant la lettre, the term narco-state itself emerged only in the late twentieth century and can be traced to a surge in the demand for illegal narcotics, particularly in North America and Europe. That demand, in turn, drove production in Latin America, Asia, and Africa, where a number of countries' geographies were suitable for the cultivation of plant-based drugs. As both demand and supply increased, so too did the influence of cartels and criminal organizations operating in these states but also increasingly engaged in cross-border trafficking. The transnational drug trade quickly became a global issue.

REGIONAL VARIATION The term narco-state gained traction initially with the ascension of powerful and emblematic drug cartels in Colombia and Mexico in the 1970s and 1980s, accompanied by the US government's declaration of a 'War on Drugs,' associated today, particularly with the administrations of Presidents Nixon and Reagan. Countries such as Bolivia, Honduras, Panama, Suriname and Venezuela all subsequently came to bear the moniker. Already in the 1990s, the narco-state label was extended beyond Latin America; Afghanistan, in particular, gained its infamous status as the world's largest producer of opium, while the focus also turned to Myanmar and North Korea. In the 2000s, Guinea-Bissau assumed a prominent role as a strategic West African transit point for illegal smuggling. More recently, countries such as Syria and Lebanon in the Middle East or Albania in Europe have also been branded narco-states.

Rather than a precise category in political science or a recognized entity under international law, the term narco-state is a political trope and, most prominently, a media buzzword. Indeed, media discourse, with its tendency for embellishment, played a key role in consolidating and popularizing the term in its current form.

CLASSIFICATIONS While no official classifications are used for narco-states, the literature related to the illegal drug trade does distinguish the states involved:

Drug-producing countries are states that cultivate, produce, and manufacture illegal narcotic substances on a significant scale and, therefore, play a key role in the global drug trade. Examples include Colombia and Afghanistan for growing and processing plant-based drugs like coca (for cocaine) and poppy (for opium), and Mexico for manufacturing synthetic drugs like methamphetamine.

Countries of passage (for drug trafficking) are states that serve as transit points for the transportation of illegal drugs from production areas to consumer markets. Not necessarily engaged in large-scale drug production or consumption, these countries are used by criminal organizations to move drugs across borders by land, air or sea due to their strategic location. Examples include Guinea-Bissau in West Africa and Panama in Central America.

Countries of drug consumption are states where illegal drugs are consumed in large amounts, fueling high demand in the global drug trade, as the widespread use of substances like cocaine, heroin or methamphetamine creates lucrative markets for drug traffickers. The largest drug-consuming countries are some of the wealthiest economies in the world, including the United States, the United Kingdom, and Australia.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE & IMPACT ON POLICY Despite little agreement on a clear definition of the narco-state, one feature common to those countries attracting the label is the fact that, in each, drug trafficking constitutes a source of political power and economic gain with the set of relations engendered between producers, consumers, state actors, traffickers and transnational capital giving rise to complex issues of political economy and governance both within the state and internationally.

Governance Policies addressing the influence of the drug trade must confront the cycles of violence, corruption, and poverty perpetuated by that drug trade's grip on the state, a challenge exacerbated by the erosion of public trust in government institutions. At the same time, such policies must address the narco-state's global dimensions, recognizing its role in transnational organized crime networks and entanglements with related phenomena, including money laundering and human trafficking. The drug trade's influence also extends to domestic and international economies. Illicit drugs have become a global commodity embedded in powerful and well-organized international networks with significant economic power. Finally, states' legal institutions are also implicated, with drug money and actors posing a challenge to the national and international rule of law.

Violence The emergence of a drug economy is both a product of and a contributor to large-scale violence. Narco-states have often emerged in the wake of war: the breakdown of social and political order and state control over borders has allowed an illicit trade to flourish, while the destruction of indigenous or self-sufficient food production has seen its replacement by the cultivation of drug crops. Conflict over control of a cash-cropping economy, in turn, has fueled further violence and insecurity.

Securitization & Intervention A common response to the narco-state label has been the securitization and militarization of the state, with governments allocating considerable resources to countering drug-related crime and violence. Heavy-handed law enforcement approaches have often led to serious human rights violations and abuses, as seen in Mexico, and the Philippines. Many governments have also sought partnerships with international agencies such as the UN Office on Drugs and Crime or foreign governments, particularly the United States. Countries such as Colombia and Afghanistan, identified as hubs for drug production, have also received significant foreign military and financial aid. At the same time, the labeling of countries as narco-states has served to delegitimize those states and their leaders while justifying and legitimizing foreign intervention. Economic sanctions, diplomatic isolation, and even military intervention have often followed.

The representation of a country as a narco-state is not merely descriptive but productive of a wide range of policies and interventions into states' political economies and institutions. Historically, however, many such policies and interventions in so-called narco-states have failed to produce the desired results. A narrow focus on drug control and suppression, often driven by a militarized approach by consumer countries, has done little to address the pressures facing precarious farmers in drug-producing countries in the developing world, where the cultivation of drug crops offers a means of survival. Such an approach has been unable to promote governance with a view to development, with securitization and militarization proving ineffective to tackle underlying issues of poverty, weak institutions and a fragile rule of law. Indeed, addressing these challenges – and the complex social reality in which they are embedded – requires a far-reaching agenda that extends well beyond the simplistic narratives conveyed by the narco-state label.

How to cite:

Almeida Cravo, Teresa, 2025. Narco-states, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Buxton, J., 2006. The political economy of narcotics. Production, consumption, and global markets. Zed Books.

Chestnut, S., 2007. Illicit activity and proliferation. North Korean smuggling networks. International Security, 32:1.

Chouvy, P.A., 2015. The myth of the narco-state. Space and Polity, 20:1.

Gibson, N., 2011. It's the Opium, Stupid: Afghanistan, Globalization, and Drugs. In Globalizing Afghanistan: Terrorism, war, and the rhetoric of nation building, Jalalzai, Z. and Jefferess, D., eds., Duke University Press.

Jennings, J.M., 1995. The Forgotten Plague: Opium and Narcotics in Korea under Japanese Rule, 1910-1945. Modern Asian Studies, 29:4.

Kingsberg, M., 2012. Legitimating empire, legitimating nation: The scientific study of opium addiction in Japanese Manchuria. The Journal of Japanese Studies.

Kingsberg, M., 2013. Methamphetamine Solution: Drugs and the Reconstruction of Nation in Postwar Japan. The Journal of Asian Studies, 72:1.

Marshall, J., 2012. The Lebanese Connection: Corruption, Civil War, and the International Drug Traffic. Stanford University Press.

Smith, N., 2005. Opiate Addiction and the Entanglements of Imperialism and Patriarchy in Manchukuo, 1932-45. The Social History of Alcohol and Drugs, 20:1.

Snyder, R., 2006. Does lootable wealth breed disorder? A political economy of extraction framework. Comparative Political Studies, 39.

Snyder, R. and Duran-Martinez, A., 2009. Does illegality breed violence? Drug trafficking and state-sponsored protection rackets. Crime, Law and Social Change, 52:3.

Nuclear Policy of Authoritarian Regimes

Our republic is a responsible nuclear state that, as we made clear before, will not use nuclear weapons first unless aggressive hostile forces use nuclear weapons to invade on our sovereignty
– Kim Jong-Un

The nuclear policy of authoritarian regimes has been steadily a source of concern for the international community because of the hypothetical threat to global security that nuclear-armed states governed by unpredictable and rogue regimes could pose. However, nuclear power is too serious an element not to be a cause for concern, regardless of the type of regime.

DEFINITION The nuclear policy of authoritarian regimes stands out because it tends to comply less with the norms established in international treaties, in particular, the Treaty of Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (NPT). The NPT aims to prevent the spread of nuclear weapons and promote disarmament and the peaceful use of nuclear energy. It is structured around three main pillars: non-proliferation, where nuclear weapon states agree not to transfer nuclear weapons or assist non-nuclear states in acquiring them; disarmament, where all parties commit to pursuing negotiations for nuclear disarmament; and peaceful use, allowing states to develop nuclear energy for peaceful purposes under strict safeguards by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA).

SEE ALSO Paradoxically, T. Doyle II (2013) termed 'nuclear despotism' to refer to how liberal democracies armed with nuclear weapons face ethical dilemmas and contradictory policy consequences, for the decision to eventually use them inherently implies a violation of constitutional and international legal provisions. In this sense, he deems the nuclear ambitions of 'rogue' states are not necessarily irrational (Doyle II 2013: 156). This clearly points to an interesting dialectic relationship between the use of nuclear weapons and undemocratic behavior, irrespective of the type of regime at stake.

ORIGIN After the USA – a democracy – was the first with nuclear monopoly between 1945 and 1949, the first authoritarian regime to develop nuclear policy was the Soviet Union during the Cold War. Under Stalin, nuclear power was exponentially developed and multiplied, either for traditional realist reasons of power maximization or to avoid servility to the West (Weeks 2014: 104). The Cold War not only motivated other powers to engage in nuclear development and tests (cf. France, the United Kingdom, China), as it also surrounded the establishment of the NPT in an environment of "continued and mutual mistrust" between liberal democracies and communist dictatorships (Doyle II 2013: 163). It is, therefore, the logic of the security dilemma that gives rise to the nuclear policies of both authoritarian and non-authoritarian regimes.

LITERATURE Although many have found that regime type has no significative effect on states' decision to pursue nuclear weapons (Fuhrmann 2009; Horowitz 2010; Jo & Gartzke 2007; Montgomery 2005), C. Way and J. Weeks (2014) analyze why some countries choose to pursue nuclear weapons while others do not, especially in the case of non-democracies. They argue that personalist regimes are more likely to pursue nuclear weapons than other regime types; they find leaders of such dictatorships are thus especially attracted by nuclear weapons to counter their regime insecurity and face fewer institutional constraints themselves to pursue such policies than the leaders of other (collegial) types of regimes (see also: Cebul 2013).

In comparison, democracies seem to present elements that allow them to tame their security dilemmas in a way that prevents proliferation more effectively, such as transparency, greater domestic constraints, adhesion and commitment to the NPT, and a civil society that is proactive in defending the cause (Chafetz 1993; Sasikumar & Way 2009; Miller & Sagan 2011; Sagan 2011). But other studies still find, on the contrary, that democracies actually may enable proliferation in order to satisfy nationalist audiences, for example, or because nuclear weapons programs enjoy public support and can generate domestic pressure in favor of proliferation (Perkovich 1999; Snyder 2000; Kroenig 2009).

D. Deudney (2007) does not seem to draw any distinction between regime types; he argues that all nuclear-armed states function, in fact, like 'nuclear monarchies' because the decision-making underlying nuclear use is concentrated in the hands of one individual command authority – hence nuclear weapons are intrinsically despotic.

In his psychological approach to nuclear proliferation, J.E. Hymans states that although there seems to be nothing that unites leaders with nuclear ambitions and actual nuclear weapons, most of them share an 'oppositional nationalism,' whereby they see their nation as opposed in equal terms to an external enemy, which generates a dangerous psychological combination of fear and pride that feeds their desire for nuclear weapons (2006: 1-2).

Traditional motives in favor of nuclear weapons include enhancing national security between rivaling neighbors (by fostering deterrence, aggression is prevented), the interests of powerful domestic interest groups, or seeking national prestige (legitimacy) (Way & Weeks 2014: 707). For authoritarian regimes, one additional motive is ensuring the security of the very regime and protecting it from external interference, which is a reason often associated with Pakistan, North Korea or Iraq under Saddam Hussein (Way & Weeks 2014: 707). It is argued that Iran's drive for nuclear weapons is in part dictated by concerns of domestic politics (Weeks 2014: 3-4).

From the perspective of (non-)compliance to the NPT by authoritarian regimes, A. Tokhi (2013) has examined quantitatively the nuclear activities of 19 Middle Eastern NPT signatories from 2001 to 2010 to find that the probability of compliance was higher in regimes where power was less concentrated in the dictator, but was shared with a select group of elites. In other words, the more power personalization, the more likely NPT policies are violated.

CLASSIFICATION Given the limited number of states with military nuclear power, as only nine possess it: China, North Korea, France, India, Pakistan, Russia, the United Kingdom, the US, and (unofficially) Israel, despite not officially confirming or denying it – the total tally of authoritarian regimes among nuclear powers is proportionally substantial. However, it cannot be said that the nuclear policy of these regimes is essentially different from that of non-authoritarian regimes. Assessing the policy differences between authoritarian and democratic regimes depends on whether or not they adhere to international standards, such as transparency, defined by bodies such as the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA); whether they are party to the NPT; and whether they are party to the Treaty on the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons (TPNW). For if they are not even parties to the treaties, to begin with, the issue of compliance ends up being fairly irrelevant.

EXAMPLES As an illustration, while only three of the nine have ratified the NPT (Russia, the United Kingdom and the US), none of them have joined the TPNW. On the other hand, violations of the NPT have been exclusively carried out by authoritarian regimes. North Korea initially joined the NPT as a non-nuclear weapon state. However, it violated its safeguards agreement by secretly developing plutonium separation and uranium enrichment programs. The country withdrew from the NPT in 2003, although the legitimacy of this withdrawal is contested. Since then, North Korea has conducted multiple nuclear tests, beginning in October 2006 and continuing through 2017, despite numerous United Nations Security Council resolutions condemning its actions and imposing sanctions. As of January 2024, the 'hermit kingdom' is believed to have assembled approximately 50 nuclear warheads and possesses enough fissile material to construct 70 to 90 nuclear weapons potentially. The country has also developed advanced programs for chemical and biological weapons. In recent years, Pyongyang has significantly increased the frequency of its ballistic missile tests, reflecting its ongoing efforts to enhance its military capabilities (Arms Control Association 2024).

IMPACT ON POLICY Democracies' perceptions of the relationship between nuclear power and authoritarian regimes are based on a strong feeling of mistrust and unpredictability toward the former. This association has already proved to have the potential to lead to conflict and generate what Hymans (2006: 216) terms 'lessons for intelligence analysis' regarding the specific example of Iraq and the US intelligence's inability to interpret the psychology of Saddam Hussein and understand his real intentions, which ultimately is said to have led to the country's invasion in 2003. Another pertinent factor of impact on policy lies in how the rise of nationalist populism, such as Boris Johnson, Narendra Modi, Vladimir Putin, and Donald Trump in nuclear-armed states – some of which are democracies – poses actual risks and dangers to the international order, for their potentially less responsible management of crises, and sometimes erratic foreign policy (Meier & Vieluf 2021).

NEW FRONTIERS N. Miller and T. Volpe (2023) have looked at the 'autocratic nuclear marketplace' and examined how Russia was able to supplant the US after the Cold War as a supplier of nuclear exports to the world. They thus connect such evolution to the rise of authoritarian Russia, in that, as unipolarity increased the pressure on Russia to compete for more influence in that matter, Russia has benefited from an 'autocratic advantage' in the insignificance of the internal opposition to that state strategy.

How to cite:

Da Mota, Sarah, 2025. Nuclear Policy of Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Arms Control Association, 2024. Arms Control and Proliferation Profile: North Korea.

Cebul, M.D., 2013. Atomic Autocrats: Authoritarian Regime Type and the Pursuit of Nuclear Weapons. Doctoral dissertation, Haverford College.

Chafetz, G., 1993. The End of the Cold War and the Future of Nuclear Proliferation: An Alternative to the Neorealist Perspective. In The Proliferation Puzzle: Why Nuclear Weapons Spread (and What Results), Frank Cass.

Deudney, D.H., 2007. Bounding Power: Republican Security Theory from the Polis to the Global Village. Princeton University Press.

Doyle II, T.E., 2013. Liberal democracy and nuclear despotism: two ethical foreign policy dilemmas. Ethics & Global Politics, 6:3.

Fuhrmann, M., 2009. Spreading Temptation: Proliferation and Peaceful Nuclear Cooperation Agreements. International Security, 34:1.

Horowitz, M., 2010. The Diffusion of Military Power: Causes and Consequences for International Politics. Princeton University Press.

Hymans, J.E., 2006. The psychology of nuclear proliferation. Identity, emotions, and foreign policy. Cambridge University Press.

Jo, D.J and Gartzke, E., 2007. Determinants of Nuclear Weapons Proliferation. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 51:1.

Kroenig, M., 2009. Importing the Bomb: Sensitive Nuclear Assistance and nuclear proliferation. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 53:2.

Meier, O., and Vieluf, M., 2021. Upsetting the nuclear order: how the rise of nationalist populism increases nuclear dangers. The Nonproliferation Review, 28:1-3.

Miller, S.E., and Sagan, S., 2011. Nuclear Power without Nuclear Proliferation? Daedalus 138:4.

Miller, N.L. and Volpe, T.A., 2023. The rise of the autocratic nuclear marketplace. Journal of Strategic Studies, 46:6.

Montgomery, A.H., 2005. Ringing in Proliferation: How to Dismantle an Atomic Bomb Network. International Security, 30:2.

Perkovich, G., 1999. India's Nuclear Bomb: The Impact on Global Proliferation. University of California Press.

Sagan, S., 2011. The Causes of nuclear weapons proliferation. Annual Review of Political Science, 14:1.
Sasikumar, K., and Way, C., 2009. Testing theories of proliferation on South Asia. In Inside Nuclear South Asia. Stanford University Press.
Snyder, J.L., 2000. From Voting to Violence: Democratization and Nationalist Conflict. W.W. Norton.
Tokhi, A., 2013. The Credibility of Authoritarian Commitments: Compliance with WMD Nonproliferation Compliance in the Middle East. Doctoral Dissertation, Freie Universität Berlin.
Way, C. and Weeks, J.L., 2014. Making it Personal: Regime Type and Nuclear Proliferation. American Journal of Political Science, 58:3.
Weeks, J.L.P., 2014. Dictators at war and peace. Cornell University Press.

Rentier States

There is no state with a democracy except Libya on the whole planet.
– Muammar Qaddafi

Rentier states are states that derive a substantial proportion of their revenues from rents (such as oil, gas, minerals, etc.), which affects the social contract between the state and its citizens. Rentier states are characterized by autocratic paternalism, corruption, low levels of state capacity and economic underperformance. Instead of collecting taxes from their populations and redistributing (some of) these funds, these dictators avoid the more challenging task of gathering tax revenues altogether and rely on rents from natural resources or other income sources. They effectively invert the phrase 'no taxation without representation,' reasoning that because they do not tax the population, they have no obligation to represent it (Dunning 2008: 52).

DEFINITION Rentier states are countries that derive a substantial proportion of their national income from natural resource-related revenue. Political scientists, and more specifically, area specialists, have argued that this abundance of resources undermines political development, administrative capacity and economic development. As Terry Lynn Karl claims, "revenues a state collects, how it collects them, and the uses to which it puts them define its nature." (Karl 1997).

Rentier states rely on external revenues, known as rents (usually derived from oil or the exploitation of other natural resources, but in some cases foreign aid – instead of extracting the domestic population's surplus production. Because the state easily captures these rents through exports, the state makes few attempts to encourage production and manufacturing, or endogenous growth – see also 'Dutch disease' in Box 1.15. Instead, the state focuses on the allocation and distribution of these rents or 'rentierism.' Much of this allocation and distribution often comes through patron-client networks (clientelism, patronage), which can give the state a certain measure of stability due to the dependence that forms between the clients and patrons (Smith 2004). Thus, in rentier states, it is only a small proportion of the population that is involved in generating the wealth and it is mostly a small number of elites who are recipients of these 'rents.'

As these states have easy access to income, this enables them to more effectively co-opt and repress their citizens, making them less likely to collapse compared to their resource-poor counterparts. Resource-rich governments can rely on natural resource rents as their primary source of income and use the income to buy political support and avoid having to tax their citizens. Because the citizens usually do not pay taxes (or pay very little), citizens in these countries, in turn, have little incentive to make demands on the regime, dampening domestic democratizing pressure (Beblawi & Luciani 2015).

SEE ALSO Related to broader practices of patrimonialism and neo-patrimonialism, rentier states are foremost associated with the dismal outcome of abundant natural resource wealth at the state level (systemic corruption). The causes of such transformation are studied separately within the frame of resource curses. The concept of rents became critical in understanding how they structure elite power dynamics within frames of patronage or clientelism; and by their use in techniques like co-optation and hoarding.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE When comparing states' access to resource rents, the literature suggests that oil (in particular) makes authoritarian regimes more durable (Andersen & Ross 2014; Morrison 2009; Ulfelder 2007; Wright et al. 2015). As mentioned, rents have a stabilizing effect on authoritarian regimes because rents are doled out to specific and important social recipients. This prolongs authoritarian rule by creating rent-funded social contracts, which would defuse the crisis and prevent rebellion. Autocrats survive longer due to oil resources, such as Saddam Hussein in Iraq or Suharto and Sukarno in Indonesia.

Natural resource revenue also provides authoritarian regimes with income they can use to ride out a crisis. During the Arab Spring, for example, the oil-rich monarchies were able to stave off widespread protests by purchasing public support, while their resource-poor counterparts collapsed in the face of mass unrest (Brownlee et al. 2015). Just days after Ben Ali fled Tunisia and a week before the onset of Egypt's revolution, Kuwait's oil-rich government announced a grant of US$3,500 to every citizen and a year's worth of free staples such as sugar, cooking oil, and milk. Likewise, Saudi Arabia announced an $80-billion package of public-sector wage hikes, unemployment payments, increased college stipends, and investments in low-income housing (Brownlee et al. 2015). Oil revenues enabled these governments to grant concessions to their citizens and diminish pressure for regime change or meaningful reform.

Natural resource wealth also increases authoritarian durability by enabling autocracies to invest in their security apparatus, enhancing the capacity and loyalty of security actors (Ross 2004) – see also coup-proofing. As a result, resource-rich countries have a more robust security apparatus to prevent, deter and repress any protests or potential rebellions. Oil-rich Kuwait, Oman, and the United Arab Emirates (UAE), for example, deployed cohesive military responses to protesters that ensured regime continuity (Brownlee et al. 2015). Additionally, because natural resource income allows governments to sustain higher-levels of military spending relative to non-resource-endowed countries, which enhances military support for the regime, natural resource-rich countries also experience fewer coups (Wright et al. 2015).

In spite of the appearance of stability, resources affect the quality of state administrative institutions. The rentier state is not a 'Weberian' state, meaning a compulsory political organization with centralized institutions that enforce rules over a territorially defined population (safeguarding its monopoly of violence). The state's legitimacy stems from its ability to maintain order and control through rational-legal rulership. Rentier states are often bloated and inefficient, as there is little incentive to create successful industries and hire the best and the brightest when the state can rely on rent to keep itself afloat. Rentier states are also "particularly vulnerable to the problems of patronage and corruption as well as bribery and nepotism." (Gawrich et al. 2011: 6). This, again, is due to the lack of incentives to hire individuals to work for the state based on merit, hard work and expertise (cf. meritocracy).

Furthermore, as mentioned higher, because rentier states can gain revenues from resources, they do not need to develop extractive institutions. A number of scholars have argued that raising income tax revenue requires states to develop administrative institutions possessing 'Weberian features' (Hydén et al. 2003: 7). The necessity to extract income may force states to develop capable administrative institutions, with competent, experienced, well-paid and autonomous staff. Thus, relying on rent instead of taxes weakens the capacity of institutions (Karl 1997).

Growth rates have been correspondingly unimpressive in resource-rich states as well. For example, in the oil-rich Middle East, after a better-than-average showing between 1960 and 1975, the Middle East recorded the lowest rate of growth in the world between 1975 and 1990 and lost nearly all the ground that it had gained earlier (Owen 1992; Said 2000). States in the Middle East with a steady flow of foreign rents have been afforded the luxury to make huge investments in state-owned enterprises with low levels of productivity. The result has been economic underperformance.

Resource-rich countries that underperform are often referred to as victims of the resource curse – whereby having an abundance of resources (oil, gas, minerals, etc.) actually undermines economic growth and stability, and on top of that, they are more prone to conflict. Rentier states can be stable and prosperous, but essentially, this comes down to governments making sound policy decisions to avoid the negative consequences of having extractive economies, as has been the case in some of the oil-rich monarchies.

Rentier states are not exclusively located in the Middle East nor mirror their organizational structure (although case studies outside the Middle East have faced more criticism). Also, what constitutes rent can be diverse, and is not just limited to natural resources. For example, revenues from canals such as the Suez Canal or pipelines (transit fees) could also be considered rent. States such as Jordan, which relies on foreign aid, also have characteristics of rentier states. Rentier states do need to have some degree of monopoly over access to resources in order to benefit from the revenues.

Rentier State Theory (RST) attempts to explain the complex relationship between the state and its citizens in countries that obtain a significant proportion of their revenues from rent. RST explains how resource-rich states use their rents to create legitimacy and maintain a stable system of authoritarian rule. RST has had its most success in explaining authoritarian stability in the Middle East but has faced more criticism in explaining the transformations that have taken place in the Gulf states. In spite of these criticisms, RST explores some of the most important questions about the political economy of oil-rich exporting states, the democratic deficit, the obstacles to development, and the nature of state-society relations in the Middle East.

ORIGIN Conceptualizing the rentier state is arguably traced to the seminal work of Hossein Mahdavy titled The Patterns and Problems of Economic Development in Rentier states: the case of Iran. In this work, Mahdavy (1970) defines rentier states as "those countries that receive on a regular basis substantial amounts of external rents (...) [and external] rents are in turn defined as rentals paid by foreign individuals" (Mahdavy 1970: 428).

At the time of Mahdavy's publication (1970), the Middle East more generally (but Iran in particular) was experiencing a political-economic transformation. Mahdavy's work was published after Iran underwent a series of major social and economic reforms known as the 'White Revolution' – a series of sweeping reforms initiated by Mohammad Reza Shah Pahlavi in Iran, starting in 1963 and lasting until 1979, aimed at modernizing the economy and society through land redistribution, women's rights, and education reforms, but ultimately contributing to reactionary political unrest that led to the 'Islamic Revolution' of 1978-1979 and Pahlavi's ouster. While Mahdavy himself (1970) was Iranian, he wrote and conducted his research outside of Iran, which gave him the space to analyze the Middle East and Iran, more specifically, with both an internal and external perspective.

LITERATURE As mentioned, no literature on rentier states could begin without starting with an exploration of Mahdavy's work, which laid out the fundamentals of 'rentierism' in 1970. Mahdavy's seminal work provides the initial framework to explain how rents affect society relations. To some extent, Mahdavy was ahead of his time, as his writing preceded the huge oil boom of the 1970s when oil prices rose ten-fold with no additional costs in production.

Greater interest in the rentier state emerged when scholars started to investigate the impact of two oil boom periods that started in the mid-1970s in the Middle East. Notable are the works of Hazem Beblawi (1984; 1986; 1987) and Giacomo Luciani (1986; 1990) and their collaborative works (Beblawi & Luciani 1987; 2015). Beblawi & Luciani's original (1987) work elevates the scholarship of RST, criticizing Mahdavi's arguments, which portrayed both the state and citizens of resource-rich states as 'backward.' They also explored the development of the state and used the Yom Kippur/Ramadan war as a key example. While they claim that this 1973 Arab-Israeli war illustrated the unity of Arab states, rents contributed to the divide of these respective states, and subsequently, a rentier vs non-rentier state dynamic emerged. There are a few crucial points to be taken from their contribution.

First, Beblawi and Luciani provided clear criteria to define what constitutes a rentier state. As they see it, there are four major dimensions: (i) more than 40 percent of national income is derived from rents. (ii) The origins of rent must be 'external' to the economy, from foreign sources. (iii) Only a few receive rent in a rentier economy, and domestic society is not actively involved in the accumulation of wealth. (iv) The government must be the principal recipient of the rent. These four dimensions set a more explicit, albeit broad, framework for the application of the RST to cases that fit within the rentier model, irrespective of what region they are in.

Second, they explain why the Middle East, and particularly the Arab Gulf monarchies, are often used to illustrate RST. Due to the immense amount of rent revenues that make up their budgets (in some cases 90%), the 'Arab oil states represent the example par excellence of rentier states' (Beblawi 1987: 46).

Third, Beblawi and Luciani (1987), through their emphasis on the dimensions of the state, give individual rentier states more agency, especially in the Middle East. In other words, their work argues against the notion that rentier states are monolithic. As a result of the increased agency of the state in their contribution, this allowed the RST to enter into other regional specific case studies. Contributions by Tim Niblock (2004) explain how the distribution of oil rents fosters legitimacy in Saudi Arabia, and this may vary from how oil rents are used in other states.

More recent scholarship on rentierism has looked at how the relationships between oil-rich states and society have transformed (Gray 2020). Older interpretations of RST do not account for transformation and the reform efforts that took place in the Gulf monarchies in the 1990s and 2000s, where deliberate strategies of economic diversification and development took place, along with liberalization of trade and investment. This was possible in small, rentier states but more challenging in rentier states with large populations, such as Iran and Iraq.

Though the rentier state thesis faced more challenges in explaining economic transformation, various studies found that oil does impede political transformations across the world (Ahmadov 2014; Andersen & Aslaksen 2013; Andersen et al. 2022; Ross 2001; 2015) and helped explain authoritarianism in the Middle East (Schlumberger 2006). RST specifically covered the robustness of security institutions in the Middle East (Bellin 2004) and the lack of democratization in oil-rich states in Africa (Anyanwu & Erhijakpor 2014). Michael Ross' (2001) seminal work argued that oil did impede democracy around the world, something which led to a host of studies either supporting the results or offering criticisms that the results no longer hold up (Brooks & Kurtz 2016; Oskarsson & Ottosen 2010). For Ross, oil hindered democracy due to stunted modernization, repression and rent patronage (Ross 2001). Oil allowed rulers to prevent changes that would normally take place with modernization, such as democratization. While democratization has not happened in many oil-rich states, modernization has been something that the field has been trying to address, as shown in the entry on resource curses.

Rentier state theory has spawned a large body of articles that have sought to determine how much of an impact there is to having rents. In spite of these notable criticisms of RST, the literature has proved to be a useful concept that other analysts and scholars can use in their respective studies of states with social-economic relations where rent plays its unique role.

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES The main methodological issue with studying the rentier state is determining whether or not it is rentierism that is driving outcomes or other factors. It has been difficult to establish a clear relationship between rent income and how this leads to different political and economic outcomes. States vary by institutional strength and capacity, political culture and regional and historical contexts, making it challenging to determine whether or not other factors are driving outcomes and making it difficult to isolate the effects of rent income.

A related issue is that Rentier State Theory has faced criticisms with endogeneity – as questions arise about whether it is actually rent that is causing an outcome and not vice versa. For example, there are questions about whether oil dependence is actually endogenous to the quality of its corresponding political institutions (Brunnschweiler 2008). It could be that weak institutions lead to oil dependence and not the other way around.

Other methodological issues have to do with data quality, with many of the best indicators used relying on data that is hard to come by in authoritarian regimes, where there is little transparency. When making comparisons in cross-national studies, it is important to have consistent and comparable data, and there are often differences in the data quality across countries.

Another issue is that most of the countries that have been the focus of the rentier state are selected on the dependent variable – where there is selection bias, making the actual findings on rentier states not generalizable. Much of the RST has focused on the oil-rich Middle East region, which makes comparison more difficult.

MEASUREMENT There are various ways to measure rentierism. Some scholars have looked at historical trends of resource dependency over time and its impact on economic and political variables. Cross-national analysis has been used to compare countries with varying degrees of resource dependence to determine how this might affect various outcomes.

In general, one way of measuring rent income is to look at *government revenue*s to see how much the government relies on taxation versus rent income. A related indicator is to look at how government spending is financed and the extent to which resource rents are used to finance social welfare programs and public sector employment. Finding these figures is more challenging. For oil, for instance, one can find data on those countries with OPEC membership (cf. Fish 2002), but there are countries where oil is important to their economy, but they are not a member of OPEC.

To illustrate the diversity of measuring resource dependency, here are some common ways to gauge oil rents and some valid critiques: The most commonly used measure has been oil export revenues over GDP, which could be easily calculated. It also showed the relative importance played by the oil sector of a country. What this doesn't explain, however, is how oil affects the population, as a country with a massive population would have a much greater challenge, such as Iran, than a country like Kuwait with a much smaller population. It also doesn't take into account the wealth of the country, as a poorer country could look more oil-rich simply because its economy was less developed, not because it produced more oil. Ross (2015: 242) confirms that such measures are biased upward in poorer countries and more conflict-prone countries since their economies are too poor to consume the oil they produce, causing them to export more than they would if they were less impoverished.

Another measurement is taking 'oil exports' as a share of total exports (Jensen & Wantchekon 2004), but this does not indicate how much a country depends on oil exports as a percentage of its GDP. Fuel income per capita is another measure – this one looks at the total value of oil and natural gas production, including domestic consumption levels and divides that by the country's population. By not using GDP as the denominator, it addresses some issues of endogeneity and captures the abundance of oil wealth rather than dependence on oil for a state's GDP.

Alternatively, rent leverage is used to address some of the shortcomings of other measurements. This consists of the ratio of fuel income per capita to GDP per capita, corrected for 'purchasing power parity' (PPP) (Ross 2012). It tackles the issue of population and accounts for the share of the average citizen's income that comes from fuel production and how that share might affect their purchasing power in a given country.

Different approaches look at the diversity of the economic base or how diversified the economy is. By utilizing these methods and indicators, researchers can quantify the degree of rentierism in a state, facilitating comparative studies and policy analysis. However, it is essential to consider the context-specific nature of rentierism and the dynamic changes in the global economy and local governance structures that can influence these measures.

EXAMPLES & REGIONAL VARIATION For MENA, Arab Gulf monarchies are considered classic cases of rentier states, with the UAE, Kuwait, Saudi Arabia, and Qatar rich in oil and/or gas rents (Ulrichsen 2016). Since the 1970s, these states have used their oil revenues to develop programs that would destroy independent civil institutions while generating other institutions that could facilitate the state's interests (Chaudhry 1994).

Most notably, these oil-rich monarchies used oil and gas rents to keep taxation rates low (or non-existent) and to offer their citizens generous benefits such as subsidized housing, free health care, and other perks. For example, more than 85 percent of Kuwaitis have jobs in the public sector and receive generous salaries and benefits (US DOS 2021), while citizens of the UAE receive massive unemployment allowance, housing allowance, childcare support, and student allowances. Emiratis also have a generous starting salary for even the most entry-level job and are offered retirement benefits at the age of 49, for citizens that have worked for 20 years.

Offering these types of benefits to the natives of the UAE and Kuwait is not that challenging, given the vast amounts of rents these states receive and the small size of their populations. Kuwait produces 32 million tons of oil per capita, and the UAE produces 19.2 million tons per capita, compared with only 1.39 million for Venezuela and two million for Iran. Saudi Arabia, another rentier state that has no personal income tax, produces 16 million tons per capita. But with a population of 36 million people compared to 4.2 million in Kuwait, Riyadh has been forced to diversity its economy and has been undergoing rapid transformation (Baumann 2019).

In some cases in the Gulf, rents were used more to repress than to distribute and allocate. In the case of Bahrain, which has some oil and gas reserves (but comparatively lower than the rest of the Gulf) and a small population of just under 1.5 million people (with about 700,000 citizens), the al-Khalifa regime was able to achieve broad support, especially among Sunnis (the royal family is Sunni) through the distribution of patronage. Most of the citizens worked either directly or indirectly for the state. However, the Sunnis constituted a minority, with as much as 60 percent of the country being Shiite, and most of the Shiite population was excluded from the social contract. When an intifada broke out in 1994, Bahrain relied heavily on economic aid from the Gulf states to give it the revenues to expand, incorporating more Shiite families into the patronage system. But for the protests that erupted in 2011 during the Arab Spring, the Bahraini leadership used repression rather than a co-optative approach. Thousands of employees were fired from the public and private sector, hundreds of students were expelled, thousands were stripped of citizenship, and over 180 people were killed (Husayn 2015). The government also bulldozed 30 Shiite mosques during the crackdown (Husayn 2015). In all of these cases in the Middle East, a combination of distribution of rents and repression is used to deter potential rebellion and ensure a stable environment for the regime.

Sub Saharan Africa Outside of the Middle East, this region has a few cases of rentier states, but they have not had as much success promoting authoritarian stability as the Gulf monarchies have had. Gabon is rich in oil, manganese, and timber resources, and like many rentier states, Gabon used its resource rents to maintain authoritarian rule under the Bongo regime from 1967 until 2023 (Omar Bongo ruled until he died in 2009 when his son Ali succeeded him), when the military staged a coup ending 56-years of Bongo rule. The regime maintained power for decades by using oil rents to bolster its security institutions, paying expats from France to staff its security services and to defend his regime, often referred to as the 'Corsican Mafia' which were only accountable to the Bongos (Decalo 1989). However, the regime failed to provide the population with much-needed public services, which fueled major grievances against the regime, eventually leading to a military coup.

In addition to Gabon, Hagmann and Reyntjens (2016) offer examples of numerous regimes in Africa that maintain authoritarian stability through the use of foreign aid rents. Based on the criteria laid out earlier by Beblawi & Luciani (1987; 2015), countries such as Gabon, South Sudan, Congo-Brazzaville, Equatorial Guinea, and Angola would all qualify as having over 40 percent of their national income from wealth, while Nigeria just misses the threshold but is the largest oil exporter in the sub-continent. However, few of these states are able to distribute vast amounts of patronage to their citizens. With over 218 million people, Nigeria's oil rents mostly went into the hands of corrupt politicians and procured unnecessary military equipment, as at least 40 percent of the population lives in poverty (Akpomera 2015).

Latin America Latin America is another region that exhibits some degree of rentierism, as the region is resource-rich. Nevertheless, what makes the nature of rentierism in Latin America distinct from rentierism in the Middle East is the value of the rent per capita and the timing of when these rents were discovered. Rentierism had its roots more recently in Latin America – starting with the huge surge in consumer demand from India and China, which led to a rise in the prices of oil and other minerals. The worth of oil exploded in value, giving countries like Brazil, Colombia, Mexico, Argentina, Ecuador and Venezuela much more revenue than ever before. By 2014, oil accounted for 96 percent of the total value of Venezuela's exports, and almost all of the foreign exchange into the country came through the state and the country's leadership has used these revenues to promote authoritarian stability.

In the case of Venezuela, the country has been rich in resources since oil was discovered in the Maracaibo Basin in 1922. Annual oil production skyrocketed from a million to 137 million barrels a year by 1929. At the point that oil was discovered in Venezuela, the country had no experience with democracy and endured a series of military dictatorships. But by 1958, Venezuela held its first democratic elections, and oil resources were doled out to the supporters of the two main parties which took turns exercising power, known as the Punto Fijo Pact. In 1976, they nationalized oil production and set up the Petróleos de Venezuela, S.A. (PDVSA), the main Venezuelan state-owned oil and natural gas company responsible for the exploration, production, refining, and exportation of oil, as well as the exploration and production of natural gas.

Hugo Chávez was elected to power in 1998 on a platform promising to use oil wealth to reduce poverty and inequality (cf. Box 3.8), but several years later, Chávez fired thousands of experienced PDVSA workers who had taken part in a strike, stripping the company of all of the important technical expertise. Even more troubling, Chávez used the PDVSA to launder money, creating fake infrastructure projects and front companies to move money around, and it also laundered billions in illegal profits from the drug trade. Essentially, Chávez transformed the PDVSA into a multi-billion-dollar enterprise that offered oil and financial resources to his allies. Chávez then used his power to hire and promote his cronies and used oil wealth to prop up programs that benefited his loyal supporters.

Chávez then used his popularity to engineer popular referenda that ended term limits while taking control of the Supreme Court, creating a parallel Senate and harassing the independent press. As oil prices fell after Chávez died in 2013, Chávez's handpicked successor, Nicolás Maduro, used repression, censorship and electoral manipulation to secure another electoral victory in 2018 in an election that was widely condemned (Brewer-Carias 2019).

Eurasia For this region, the resource-rich Central Asian states have been prone to rentierism. With that said, Kazakhstan, Kyrgyzstan, Tajikistan, Turkmenistan, and Uzbekistan all have rentier characteristics, but not all are rentier states. While Kazakhstan and Turkmenistan can be considered full-scale rentier states, Kyrgyzstan and Tajikistan could be considered to be rentier economies due to their dependency on rent that is based on both natural resources and other rents such as remittances (Gyene 2016) (Uzbekistan with its much larger population lies somewhat in the middle.) In the case of Kazakhstan, at its peak in 2008, oil revenues constituted 33 percent of its GDP (Sanghera & Satybaldieva 2022). Though the beneficiaries of these rents are overwhelmingly elites, they have been fairly discreet about their accumulation of wealth, leading many Kazakhs to believe that the economic opportunities and outcomes in their country are largely fair (Sanghera & Satybaldieva 2022). When protests have occurred, the state has used its robust security apparatus and responded with violence, arresting and imprisoning any activists (Marat 2016). Coupled together, these two strategies of distribution and repression have ensured the stability of authoritarian rule in Kazakhstan.

IMPACT ON POLICY Currently, many rentier economies, especially those based on fossil fuels, are undergoing a process of rebuilding their economies. Many reasons induce such an urgent pivot to the diversification of rentier economies. In addition to concerns that oil rents will dry up, there are also global pressures to address the impact that fossil fuels have on the environment and climate change.

It is therefore not surprising to see National Vision 2030 (Qatar) and Oman Vision 2040, which prioritize diversification of their economies as a cornerstone of their strategies for survival and stability. However, to claim that rentier states, especially those in the Middle East are eager to move away from their position as oil suppliers would be premature. Rentier states are largely balancing the need to restructure their economies and become less dependent on resource rents while making the most out of the opportunities from global conditions (such as the Russian-Ukraine war). Therefore, these states now speak more with a language of investment than a language of rent providers. Foreign direct investment has far more resonance in these states, especially in the Gulf.

NEW FRONTIERS Rents are still too often equated with oil and gas and there could be more studies that focus on the variation of rents and their roles in the political economy of states.

In addition, given the shift away from fossil fuels and the pivot to green energy, it will be interesting to explore how rentier states are adapting to this shift. These regimes understand that the natural resources are not as valuable as they once were, and therefore, adapting to this is an existential question for these states. When looking at the Gulf, almost all rentier states have invested greatly in diversifying their economy from an oil-centric economic system to an economy that is embracing foreign direct investment and tourism.

The second way in which these states are adapting is to reinvest the money they already have by boosting their sovereign wealth funds. In recent years, sovereign wealth funds have been more proactive in investing the states' money. This, in turn, also generates non-oil rent for the state, subsequently giving the state longevity in its revenue stream.

The third way that they are adapting is by utilizing the natural resources they still have. If the Russian invasion of Ukraine illustrated anything, it is that notwithstanding the pivot toward clean energy, natural resources (be it oil and gas) are still crucial to the international economy and global geopolitics. Rentier states are simultaneously investing in diversifying their economy while maximizing their revenue from natural resources – including leverage in international relations. This can be seen in the OPEC+ alliance, where the oil cartel struck an alliance with Russia to coordinate oil prices in the hope of prolonging the value of oil.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Rentier States, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ahmadov, A.K., 2014. Oil, democracy, and context: A meta-analysis. Comparative Political Studies, 47:9.

Akpomera, E., 2015. International crude oil theft: elite predatory tendencies in Nigeria. Review of African Political Economy, 42:143.

Andersen, J.J. and Aslaksen, S., 2013. Oil and political survival. Journal of Development Economics, 100:1.

Andersen, J.J., Hamang, J.H. and Ross, M.L., 2022. Declining Oil Production Leads to More Democratic Governments. Center for Global Development, 620.

Andersen, J.J. and Ross, M.L., 2014. The big oil change: A closer look at the Haber–Menaldo analysis. Comparative Political Studies, 47:7.

Anyanwu, J.C. and Erhijakpor, A.E., 2014. Does oil wealth affect democracy in Africa? African Development Review, 26:1.

Bates, R.H. ed., 2020. Toward a political economy of development. University of California Press.

Baumann, H., 2019. The transformation of Saudi Arabia's rentier state and 'the international.' Globalizations, 16:7.

Beblawi, H., 1984. The Arab Gulf Economy in a Turbulent Age. Croom Helm.

Beblawi, H., 1987. The Rentier State in the Arab World. Arab Studies Quarterly, 9:4.

Beblawi, H., 1986. The Arab Oil Era (1973-1983): A Story of Lost Opportunity. Journal of Arab Affairs, 5:1.

Beblawi, H. and Luciani, G., eds., 1987. The Rentier State (Volume, 2), Nation. State and the Integration of the Arab World, Croom Helm.

Beblawi, H. and Luciani, G., eds., [1987], 2015. The Rentier State. Routledge.

Bellin, E., 2004. The Robustness of Authoritarianism in the Middle East: Exceptionalism in Comparative Perspective. Comparative Politics, 36:2.

Brewer-Carias, A.R., 2019. The Collapse of the Rule of Law in Venezuela 1999-2019. New York University Journal of International Law and Politics, 52.

Brooks, S.M. and Kurtz, M.J., 2016. Oil and democracy: endogenous natural resources and the political "resource curse." International Organization, 70:2.

Brownlee, J., Masoud, T.E. and Reynolds, A., 2015. The Arab Spring: Pathways of repression and reform. Oxford University Press.

Brunnschweiler, C.N., 2008. Cursing the blessings? Natural resource abundance, institutions, and economic growth. World Development, 36:3.

Chaudhry, K.A., 1994. Economic liberalization and the lineages of the rentier state. Comparative Politics, 27:1.

Decalo, S., 1989. Modalities of civil-military stability in Africa. The Journal of Modern African Studies, 27:4.

Dell'Aguzzo, L. and Diodato, E., 2023. Patron-client state relations and the geopolitics of authoritarian survival and breakdown: evidence from the MENA countries. Contemporary Politics, 29:1.

Dunning, T., 2008. Crude democracy: Natural resource wealth and political regimes. Cambridge University Press.

Franke, A., Gawrich, A. and Alakbarov, G., 2009. Kazakhstan and Azerbaijan as post-Soviet Rentier States: Resource Incomes and Autocracy as a Double 'Curse' in post-Soviet Regimes. Europe-Asia Studies, 61:1.

Fish, M.S., 2002. Islam and Authoritarianism. World Politics, 55:1.

Gawrich, A., Melnykovska, I. and Schweickert, R., 2010. More than Oil and GeographyfNeopatrimonialism as an Explanation of Bad Governance and Autocratic Stability in Central Asia. Paper to be presented at the Workshop on "Neopatrimonialism in Various World Regions." German Institute of Global and Area Studies (GIGA).

Gyene, P.I., 2016. "Rentier States" or the Relationship Between Regime Stability and Exercising Power in post-Soviet Central Asia. Society and Economy. Central and Eastern Europe – Journal of the Corvinus University of Budapest, 38:2.
Giustozzi, A., 2003. Respectable Warlords: The Challenge of State Building in post Taleban Afghanistan. Crisis Research Center Working Paper, 33:6.
Goran, H., Julius, C. and Ken, M., 2003. The Bureaucracy and Governance in 16 Developing Countries. Overseas Development Institute. World Governance Survey Discussion, 7.
Gray, M., 2020. Rentierism's siblings: On the linkages between rents, neopatrimonialism, and entrepreneurial state capitalism in the Persian Gulf monarchies. In The "Resource Curse" in the Persian Gulf. Routledge.
Hagmann, T. and Reyntjens, F. eds., 2016. Aid and authoritarianism in Africa: development without democracy. Bloomsbury Publishing.
Husayn, N., 2015. Mechanisms of authoritarian rule in Bahrain. Arab Studies Quarterly, 37:1.
Hydén, G. and Mease, K., 2004. Making sense of governance: empirical evidence from sixteen developing countries. Lynne Rienner Publishers.
Jensen, N. and Wantchekon, L., 2004. Resource wealth and political regimes in Africa. Comparative political studies, 37:7.
Karl, T.L., 1997. The Paradox of Plenty: Oil Booms and Petro-States. University of California Press.
Luciani, G., ed., 1986. Public finance in the Arab countries. Manuscript reports. IDRC-MR135e.
Luciani, G. ed., 1990. The Arab State. University of California Press.
Lundahl, M., 2010. Inside the Predatory State: The Rationale, Methods, and Economic Consequences of Kleptocratic Regimes. Nordic Journal of Political Economy, 24.
Mahdavy, H., 1970. The Patterns and Problems of Economic Development in Rentier States: The Case of Iran. Studies in the Economic History of the Middle East, 428.
Marat, E., 2016. Post-violence regime survival and expansion in Kazakhstan and Tajikistan. Central Asian Survey, 35:4.
Moore, M., 2004. Revenues, State Formation, and the Quality of Governance in Developing Countries. International Political Science Review, 25:3.
Morrison, K.M., 2009. Oil, nontax revenue, and the redistributional foundations of regime stability. International organization, 63:1.
Niblock, T., 2004. Saudi Arabia: Power, legitimacy and survival. Routledge.
O'Donnell, G., 1993. On the state, Democratization and some Conceptual Problems: A Latin American View with Glances at some post-Communist Countries. World Development, 21:8.
Oskarsson, S. and Ottosen, E., 2010. Does oil still hinder democracy? The Journal of Development Studies, 46:6.
Owen, R., 2013. State, Power and Politics in the Making of the Modern Middle East. Routledge.
Ross, M.L., 2001. Does oil hinder democracy? World politics, 53:3.
Ross, M.L., 2004. How do natural resources influence civil war? Evidence from thirteen cases. International organization, 58:1.
Ross, M.L., 2015. What have we learned about the resource curse? Annual Review of Political Science, 18.
Said, M.E., 2000. Egypt: The Dialectics of State Security and Social Decay. International Politics and Society, 1.
Sanghera, B. and Satybaldieva, E., 2022. Rentier Capitalism and Class Warfare in Kazakhstan. CounterPunch.
Schlumberger, O., 2006. Rents, reform, and authoritarianism in the Middle East. Internationale Politik und Gesellschaft, 2.
Smith, B., 2004. Oil Wealth and Regime Survival in the Developing World, 1960-1999. American Journal of Political Science, 48:2.
Ulfelder, J., 2007. Natural-resource wealth and the survival of autocracy. Comparative political studies, 40:8.
US DOS, 2021. 2021 Investment Climate Statements: Kuwait. US State Department Report.
Weyland, K., 2009. The Rise of Latin America's Two Lefts: Insights from Rentier State Theory. Comparative politics, 41:2.
Wright, J., Frantz, E. and Geddes, B., 2015. Oil and autocratic regime survival. British Journal of Political Science, 45:2.

Spectacle Politics

The spectacle is not a collection of images, but a social relation among people, mediated by images.
– Guy Ernest Debord

Spectacle politics is a neutral term for when a political regime sets up a show with the goal to signal a political message to the international community or its domestic audience. Despite similar behavior, democracies and autocracies envision different applications for their spectacles with different audiences and objectives.

DEFINITION Mary Kaldor (2004) calls spectacle nationalism the performance that legitimizes the existing states. In this regard, spectacle politics is not only a matter of authoritarian regimes and dictatorships. Spectacle politics could be performed in democratic systems as well (the coronation of Charles III in the United Kingdom on 6 May 2023 is one of the bright examples of democratic systems) as the inauguration ceremonies of leaders, commemorations of crucial days and historical anniversaries and remembrances. Authoritarian regimes tend to perform spectacle politics to celebrate the system and the leader.

SEE ALSO The spectacle in politics is often connected with cultural or sports politics as well as nationalism in authoritarian regimes. It is closely related to the studies of nation branding and authoritarian urbanism and, in some cases, seamlessly intertwines with personality cults.

ORIGIN In August 1995, social psychologist Michael Billig (1995) published a book, Banal Nationalism, which deals with the everyday usage of national symbols in the public space. Although he mainly focused on democratic states, it became the point of departure for social scientists studying similar problems in authoritarian regimes. His ideas were developed by Mary Kaldor (2004) in her idea of 'spectacle nationalism.' Billig's work was reconsidered and revised critically more than 20 years later by his disciples (Skey & Antonsich 2017).

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Spectacle politics is applied in many ways to demonstrate a regime's legitimacy, stability and prosperity. Such politics differ mainly according to the chosen field or the target public. In the latter case, the literature (Horák 2020) usually distinguishes the international and domestic public. An external audience is usually presented with the achievements of the regime itself or its ideological superiority (soft power), in particular targeting its rivals or competitors. Such spectacle politics could consist of spectacles performed outside the country. It can be the physical participation of the country in events outside the regime – trade fairs, political summits, and sports events (World Championships, Olympic Games). The successes in these events are later transformed, in addition to banal nationalism, into the regime's success.

On the contrary, the absence of important attendees in spectacle politics is often considered an attack on the regime. The boycott of the Olympic Games in Moscow in 1980 (Kanin 2019) or the limitation and later elimination of Russian athletes from the world's top events after several scandals or after the Russian invasion of Ukraine, respectively, were among the most prominent examples of such "exclusion from spectacle politics." An excluded regime can also create a 'counter-event' that should substitute the main event (the case of 'The Friendship (Druzhba) Games' in 1984 to balance the socialist bloc country boycott of the Olympic Games or the Russia-organized series of ice hockey matches with friendly countries instead of the World Championship.

CLASSIFICATIONS Several ceremonies and rituals within the regime are mostly aimed at the domestic public, cementing the regime's legitimacy ('spectacle nationalism' or 'spectacle patriotism'). These events include the celebrations of 'independence days' and other important state holidays, Memory days, e.g., the 9 May celebrations in Russia and throughout the post-Soviet area, historical data and events commemorations etc. (Wood 2021). In the case of more centralized and personalist systems, the leader's position and personality cult is the particular focus of such mass spectacles (Merkel 2013). In addition to spectacle nationalism or spectacle patriotism, such an approach could be called 'spectacle personalism' (see also 'versailling' under coup-proofing).

Apart from major events demonstrated to an external public, authoritarian (but also democratic) systems stimulate regular local spectacles such as raising the flag at schools and other places with mass participation (school pupils, state officers or others). Personalist and more extreme authoritarian regimes also enhance the spectacles expressing loyalty to the leader or the regime leadership (such as the 'oath to the president' performed daily in Turkmenistan schools under the rule of its founding president, Saparmurat Niyazov).

While the celebrations in the democratic systems tend to open the public spaces for the public, the spectacles in the authoritarian regimes prefer the ritualized performances where collective action (often forced mass participation) prevails over individual needs. The mass public serves mainly to take part in the performance, while the other part of the public is mostly excluded from the participation, such as in the case of military parades in Russia, China, Turkmenistan or North Korea, and they should limit themselves to hide in their homes and, at the most, watch the spectacle in the media.

IMPACT ON POLICY Demonstrating authoritarian leadership on the world scene (participation in summits with the most influential politicians and mediation of the conflict) also shows the country's importance and acceptance of its leaders in the world. It signals that regimes are considered de jure equal players in the international arena and thus generate external legitimacy for its power-holders. When events take place on its territory, a regime can demonstrate its ability to organize such an important event (a political summit, an essential economic forum), provide a place for peace negotiations, and host sports or cultural events.

EXAMPLES Sports representation and winning medals in top-sport events became one of the main achievements of communist bloc regimes (USSR, German Democratic Republic (DDR – 'East Germany'), Czechoslovakia), leading up to doping or corruption practices. The banal nationalism in spectacle politics also leads to establishing cultural units representing the countries in the outside world. The case of the Moranbong Band in North Korea (Korhonen & Cathcart 2017) and Eurovision groups from Eastern Europe partaking in international competitions are bright examples of this approach (the Moranbong Band (모란봉악단 – 'Moran hill band' are an all-female musical group and a high-profile and influential component of North Korean popular culture, established by Kim Jong-Un in 2012.)

One of the notable studies of this phenomenon in an authoritarian context was the research by Laura Adams (2010) on Uzbekistan and how the Karimov regime crafted a national identity rooted in tradition, history, and heritage, which serves to legitimize the regime domestically and bolster external legitimacy. Specifically, one example is the annual Navruz (New Year) celebration. Navruz, traditionally marking the spring equinox, was repurposed by the Uzbek government to emphasize themes of national unity, heritage, and state pride. The government organizes large-scale celebrations with music, dance, and theatrical performances that portray Uzbekistan's pre-Soviet history, linking modern Uzbek identity with ancient Central Asian traditions. These festivals highlight Uzbekistan's cultural continuity while subtly distancing the state from its Soviet past.

How to cite:

Horák, Slavomír, 2025. Spectacle Politics, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adams, L., 2010. The Spectacular State. Culture and National Identity in Uzbekistan. Duke University Press.
Billig, M., 2005. Banal Nationalism. Sage Publications.
Emami, F., 2014. Urbanism of Grandiosity: Planning a New Urban Centre for Tehran (1973-76). International Journal of Islamic Architecture, 3:1.
Fauve, A., 2015. Global Astana: Nation branding as a legitimisation tool for authoritarian regimes. Central Asian Survey, 34:1.
Horák, S., 2016. Nation-building and sporting spectacles in authoritarian regimes: Turkmenistan's Aziada-2017. In Critical Geographies of Sport, Koch, N., ed., Routledge.
Horák, S., 2020. Sports politics in authoritarian regimes: The synergies of sport, ideology and personality cult in Turkmenistan. In Sport, Statehood and Transition in Europe, Rojo-Labaien, E., Rodríguez-Díaz, Á., and Rookwood J., eds., Routledge.
Horák, S., 2023. The architecture as a showcase of a personal regime. In Routledge Handbook of Asian Cities, Hu Ri., ed., Routledge.
Kaldor, M., 2004. Nationalism and globalisation. Nations and nationalism, 10:1-2.
Koch, N., 2018. The geopolitics of spectacle: Space, synecdoche, and the new capitals of Asia. Cornell University Press.
Korhonen, P. and Cathcart, A., 2017. Tradition and legitimation in North Korea. The Review of Korean Studies, 20:2.
Merkel, U, 2013. 'The Grand Mass Gymnastics and Artistic Performance Arirang' (2002-2012): North Korea's Socialist–Realist Response to Global Sports Spectacles. The International Journal of the History of Sport, 30:1.
Riordan, J., 1974. Soviet sport and Soviet foreign policy. Soviet Studies, 26:3.
Skey, M. and Antonsich, M., eds., 2017. Everyday Nationhood. Theorising, Culture, Identity and Belonging after Banal Nationalism. Palgrave Macmillan.
Vuletic, D., 2018. The Eurovision Song Contest in the Musical Diplomacy of Authoritarian States. In International Relations, Music and Diplomacy: Sounds and Voices on the International Stage. Palgrave Macmillan.
Wood, E. A., 2021. Performing memory and its limits: Vladimir Putin and the celebration of World War II in Russia. In The Memory of the Second World War in Soviet and Post-Soviet Russia. Routledge.

Box 7.7 Dubaization & Ashgabatization of Urban Planning in Central Asia

Dubai will never settle for anything less than first place.
– Sheikh Mohammed bin Rashid Al Maktoum

Ashgabat feels like a fascist Vegas
– Scott Newton

The rapid development of Central Asian cities, often driven by the ideological ambitions of authoritarian rulers to enhance their regimes' global visibility, has led to extensive and systemic urban transformations. These changes encompass not only city centers but also suburban areas. The transition from Soviet-era cities to more globally inspired urban landscapes includes the construction of new administrative buildings (e.g., presidential palaces, parliaments, universities), commercial facilities (hotels, malls, restaurants, tourist hubs), infrastructure projects (highways, intersections), and symbolic visual art that reinforces regime narratives (monuments, fountains). This transformation primarily targets the perspective of first-time observers – whether the leader is viewing the city from the main streets or the air or foreign visitors (Koch 2018; Horák 2023). Consequently, urban planners prioritize the aesthetics of main thoroughfares and aerial views. In many cases, ruling elites and their families profit from these projects through their involvement in construction businesses.

In Central Asia, most capitals and even regional centers have undergone significant transformations that frequently disregard historical heritage – whether Soviet, Russian colonial or pre-colonial – and the needs of residents. Inspired by Dubai's urban model as a symbol of modern transformation, many regional leaders have sought to replicate its example in their own countries. This phenomenon of 'Dubaization' is not limited to Central Asia but has also influenced other post-Soviet and Asian cities (Valiev 2013; Yigitcanlar & Bulu 2015). While cities like Dubai and Astana were developed on largely undeveloped sites ('greenfield' or 'yellow field' projects), cities such as Tashkent and Bishkek have focused on refurbishing select parts of their urban areas, particularly downtowns. However, Ashgabat (Turkmenistan's capital) and, more recently, Dushanbe (Tajikistan's capital) exemplify a more radical approach: the total modernization of urban landscapes. This process involves not only downtown areas but also peripheral neighborhoods (e.g., Soviet-era mikrorayons), creating what might be termed the 'Ashgabatization' of cities.

Unlike 'Dubaization,' which follows a coherent logic of creating modern urban facilities from scratch, 'Ashgabatization' disrupts existing urban landscapes in ways unanticipated by Soviet or pre-Soviet planners. This approach often leads to degraded living conditions, environmental harm, reduced public transport accessibility (favoring car-centric designs), and the transformation of capitals into 'ghost towns' designed for observation by cars or helicopters rather than for residents. Dushanbe has become a prime example of this trend alongside Ashgabat itself.

How to cite:

Horák, Slavomír, 2025. Dubaization and Ashgabatization of Urban Planning in Central Asia, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Yigitcanlar, T. and Bulu, M., 2015. Dubaization of Istanbul: Insights from the knowledge-based urban development journey of an emerging local economy. Environment and Planning A, 47(1).
Valiyev, A., 2013. Baku. Cities, 31.
Koch, N., 2018. The geopolitics of spectacle: Space, synecdoche, and the new capitals of Asia. Cornell University Press.
Horák, S., 2023. Ashgabat: The architecture as a showcase of a personal regime. In Routledge Handbook of Asian Cities, Hu, R., ed., Routledge.

State Fragility & Failure

Without intensifying our efforts to help those living in fragile states, our hopes of a more stable and peaceful world will also be dashed.
– Kofi Annan

While fully-fledged states enjoy full external and internal sovereignty, some countries lack one of these two types of sovereignty. Countries that lack external sovereignty – where other states do not recognize the borders or sovereignty of a territory's internal regime – are designated as de facto states. Countries that lack 'internal sovereignty' run the gamut of being weak, failed or collapsed states. Other terms used to describe these states include fragile, vulnerable, failing, unstable, in crisis or disrupted. State failure is the process whereby the state and its government are unable to provide security to the population and fail to provide the basic functions of the state. However, there is no universal understanding of how to define such a process of state failure conceptually, and nor is there a clear categorization and typology of failing states.

DEFINITION One of the most commonly used definitions of failed/fragile states is that by the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD), which says that "States are fragile when state structures lack political will and/or capacity to provide the basic functions needed for poverty reduction, development and to safeguard the security and human rights of their populations" (OECD/DAC 2007: 2). The UK's Department for International Development (DFID) defines fragile states similarly as "those where the government cannot or will not deliver core functions to the majority of its people, including the poor. The most important functions of the state for poverty reduction are territorial control, safety and security, capacity to manage public resources, delivery of basic services, and the ability to protect and support the ways in which the poorest people sustain themselves" (DFID 2005: 7).

However, while there is some consensus on the basic definition, there is much debate about how the term should be fully conceptualized and classified and what terminology should be used (for discussion, see e.g., Ezrow & Frantz 2013: 1323-1325). One of the more prominent conceptualizations with a typology of weak statehood was developed by Robert Rotberg. His approach is usually taken as a starting point for discussing the problems with understanding state failure, and the Failed State Index (FSI) drew from his conceptualization to measure weak statehood.

Rotberg (2003) divides states into strong (a), weak (b), failed (c) and collapsed (d). Strong states (a) are those units that control their territories and provide security and order for their inhabitants. Strong states also ensure political rights and civil liberties and create an environment conducive to economic growth. The rule of law prevails, as well as a high level of education, health care and a good condition of the public infrastructure. Weak states (b) are defined as states that are weak by their very nature, i.e., they have some geographical, physical and economic constraints, or they could also be generally strong states but temporarily weakened by internal contradictions, ineffective governance, greed, despotism or external attacks. In weak states, there are ethnic, religious, linguistic or other community tensions, but no overtly violent clashes. Weak states also experience a deterioration of public institutions and an increase in crime and corruption within the state.

Failed states (c), according to Rotberg (2003), are classified as territories fraught with tensions where armed conflicts between disparate groups are ongoing. High levels of crime and lawlessness are also a common characteristic. Another striking feature is the general economic decline, which has led to the disintegration of infrastructure and the gradual disappearance of all social services. In the peripheries of the failed state, the loss of control over these areas could lead to attempts at separation, inter-group violence and the plundering of local wealth. Collapsed states (d) represent an extreme case of states in terms of their weakness. Collapsed states do not control their territories, and the governments of such countries have lost legitimacy. Power over the state formation is usually taken over by non-state actors (Rotberg 2003: 3-7) – cf. warlordism.

Though Rotberg's typology offers a useful starting point, there are different criticisms of his approach. First, Rotberg's typology does not delineate the different degrees of state failure. Rotberg's understanding of weak statehood has also been criticized by Milliken and Krause (2003), who do not see state failure and state collapse as two stages of the same process but as qualitatively different phenomena, each involving a different dimension of state functioning. A distinction is made between how strong or weak the institutions are, how these institutions are functioning and for what purpose. For example, in the case of Rwanda, though often referred to as a collapsed state, the genocide (Box 1.19) was not caused by the disintegration of state institutions. The perpetrators were "highly disciplined agents of the state who pursued the task of murdering many of its people with hideous efficiency" (Clapham 2003: 26). The concepts of weak statehood and state failure present more theoretical and empirical problems, mostly due to the complexity of defining and measuring these terms and the insufficient precision given to identifying different stages. As a result, there exist a variety of definitions and also indicators of state failure.

Charles T. Call (2008; 2011) is very critical of the concept of 'failed states,' and he is not alone (Kraxberger 2007; Dingli 2013; Nay 2013; Brinkerhoff 2014). His main concerns (i-v) can be listed as follows: (i) There is a definite cultural assumption of how a 'successful' state should look like, making the concept Western-centric at best and an excuse to intervene in the affairs of others at worst (Bøås & Jennings 2007). This teleological Western bias assumes there is a 'good' endpoint towards which all states should evolve (Call 2008: 1494, 1499).

"The schoolmarm tone of the concept is apparent: states are 'bad' because they have failed some externally defined test. Even where a state's population might be better served by the temporary or partial assumption of its sovereignty by some assemblage of international or regional actors, (...) the multiple problems of such arrangements – [as] alternatives to the failed state – are not acknowledged or considered." (Krasner 2004, cited in Call 2008: 1499).

(ii) Any broad definition leads to the excessive aggregation of diverse states and various problems under one label. (iii) The concept obscures tailor-made solutions and only offers a single prescription: more order, even when the prevailing order is unjust. (iv) The concept covers up the thorny issues of democratization, representation, horizontal accountability and transparency by framing its discourse solely in terms of state-building in an apolitical and technical way. (v) Call states that this discourse also conflates the diverging needs for peace and 'stateness:' Sometimes peace-building is forced to delay state-building, and sometimes strengthening states leads to more instability. Finally, the failed state label obfuscates the role of external actors in how these states 'failed' in the first place. This ahistorical scoring neglects the long legacy of dependency and its impact on the contemporary condition of these states (Call 2008: 1494-1450). This leads to perpetuation and institutionalization of the world hierarchy rather than leveling the 'unequal global playing field.' (Chandler 2006: 64).

KEY SIGNIFICANCE & IMPACT ON POLICY There are a number of risks associated with failed/fragile states. One of the notable impacts is how state failure affects the populations living in them, how this generates a refugee crisis, and may spread the crisis to other regions, thus heightening global security risks and potentially leading to armed conflict. The breakdown of law and order in these regions can lead to humanitarian and economic disaster, which concerns not only the people directly affected but also the population of neighboring states. Analysts also point to the potential of a failed state to develop weapons of mass destruction and contribute to their proliferation. According to Patrick (2006: 36-37), there is empirical evidence that failed states are hotbeds of terrorism. Sachs (2003: 30-31) mentions also other concerns like environmental degradation and the spread of diseases. Takeyh and Gvosdev (2002: 96-97) argue that failed states are safe havens for smuggling drugs and using their trafficking to fund the ruling regime, thus contributing significantly to the instability of the wider region in which they are located.

The exact relation between regime type and state fragility remains an obscure and complex one. In contrast to common belief, a strong state is not always a necessary pre-requirement for democracy to develop. Using Large-N data, Gjerløw et al. (2021) find mixed evidence regarding this stateness-first hypothesis and no convincing evidence that countries became richer by following this 'golden sequence' of institutional development. Democratization appears to be favorable for economic development, even in weak states. More research is needed to untangle this complex, multivariate relationship.

All these negative aspects naturally have led the international community to formulate policies toward failed/fragile states. While basic research is focused primarily on explaining and identifying the causes of state failure, in applied research, the core problem is to find out how to intervene effectively to slow, halt or reverse the process of state failure (Iqbal & Starr 2015: 19).

There is no blueprint for fixing state fragility because the effects of all instruments largely depend on the context and the interaction between internal and external factors. Engagement that began out of concern for global security has increasingly been framed in the last decade through a development lens. It is not surprising that national governments and international organizations are trying not to leave fragile states behind and support their journey toward good governance, stronger institutions, economic development, and post-conflict reconstruction, and thus help contribute to the UN Sustainable Development Goals agenda. This engagement is based on The Principles for Good International Engagement in Fragile States and on the New Deal for Engagement in Fragile States (OECD 2007; EU Public Group on Fragility and Crisis Situations 2023).

ORIGIN Research oriented towards the analysis of weak states began during the 1960s to address the internal weakness and instability of newly emerging postcolonial states. It is primarily associated with Gunnar Myrdal, who referred to political units that have failed to fulfill the classical functions of the state as 'soft states.' In his conceptualization, the soft state lacks the basic elements of statehood and has gained sovereignty by virtue of decisions taken by the international community. It has thus avoided the normal state-building process, and the result is a lack of institutionalization, political backwardness and weak performance of the state apparatus (Myrdal 1968: 277). Although the concept was originally designed for the states of Southeast Asia, since decolonization, it has mostly been applied to newly created states in Sub Saharan Africa. The soft state is also characterized by neo-patrimonialism in practice, leading to the decline of the state structures and sensitivity to outbreaks of general chaos and violence.

The research into weak postcolonial states was followed up by Jackson and Rosberg (1982), who refer to weak African countries of the time as 'juridical states,' which are sovereign only on the basis of decisions of the international community but lack empirical elements of statehood: the crucial impulse to explore weak statehood came a decade later. The collapse of the bipolar world order and the deepening poverty in the Global South during the 1990s have given new impetus to research on weak statehood. It is no coincidence that foreign policy analysts introduced the concepts of failed and failing states in the early 1990s. Since then, these have been widely disseminated by US administrations and policy analysts after 11 September 2001, often as a justification for foreign intervention.

The notion of a fragile state has had a slightly different trajectory. As aptly observed and summarized by Nay (2013), it has spread internationally among donors, technical agencies and some governments, especially in the areas of development, humanitarian assistance and peace-building. In particular, it has been widely used by the OECD and the World Bank since the mid-2000s to designate the poorest and most unstable countries that cannot meet minimum standards set by major donors of development aid (Nay 2013: 2). From this point on, failed/fragile states have come to be seen as a global security threat, regardless of their geographical location. The issue of failed/fragile states has thus made the headlines and entered into the wider public consciousness.

LITERATURE In the context of the growing interest of political leaders, international organizations, and the general public in what is happening in failing states, a wide range of research (meaning also new typologies, terminologies, and ways of measuring weak statehood) emerged after 1995. Georg Sørensen came up with the label disrupted state for the unconsolidated postcolonial state on the periphery, often in a continuing state of entropy (Sørensen 1999: 24). William Zartman came up with another (now widely used) term: collapsed states, representing entities with extreme cases of governance problems, where the state is unable to provide security to its inhabitants, nor does it ensure control over territory, thus losing legitimacy. He sees the collapse of state institutions as a loss of control over political and economic life in the country. He also convincingly demonstrates that the various functions of the state are very closely interrelated, meaning that if one function is weakened, the other functions begin to weaken as well (Zartman 1995: 1-15).

Lisa Chauvet and Paul Collier also work with the phenomenon of state collapse. In their research on the causes of conflicts, they use the label failed states, which they define as low-income countries in which economic policies, institutions, and government are so weak that economic growth is highly unlikely. The state loses legitimacy in the eyes of its citizens because, even when the country is at peace, these citizens suffer. The statistical patterns suggest that such entities are at significant risk of descending into civil war (Chauvet & Collier 2005: 1). Their empirical research has clearly shown that the combination of poverty and stagnation significantly increases the likelihood of conflict.

The World Bank's LICUS initiative (low-income countries under stress) has focused on the identification, analysis and comprehensive assistance to low-income countries under stress since 2004. It refers to such countries as fragile states characterized by exceptionally weak policies (socioeconomic as well as political), institutions, and governance, and many are either conflict-vulnerable or post-conflict states (World Bank 2023a). Research by the UK's DFID addresses the issue from a humanitarian point of view. Mostly, applied institutional research has been primarily provided by bilateral or multilateral development aid organizations, such as the World Bank or DFID, the OECD's Development Assistance Committee (OECD/DAC), the US Agency for International Development (USAID) as well as the entire spectrum of UN agencies. In an effort to synthesize different approaches, the Fragile State Index (FSI) (formerly the Failed States Index, see below) has been published since 2005 by the US think-tank Fund for Peace.

CLASSIFICATIONS As previously mentioned, the most commonly used classification of failed states into weak, failed and collapsed states was developed by Rotberg. Another interesting typology of failed states was laid out by Jean-Germain Gros (1996). Gros comes up with five different categories: (a) anarchic, (b) phantom, (c) anaemic, (d) captured and (e) aborted. Anarchic states (a) do not have a central government and are characterized by the presence of armed groups that fight for power. Phantom states (b) have a central government, but their power is very limited (in some places virtually non-existent), and the economic system operates independently of the government. Anaemic states (c) are characterized by the fact that the power of the central authority is very weak, usually as a result of targeted efforts by anti-government actors to capture government positions. Captured states (d), on the other hand, are characterized by a strong central government that essentially does not allow opposition to emerge. The last type of failed state, according to Gros, is the so-called aborted state (e), which collapsed essentially before it began to take real shape. The cause of such a collapse is often the rapid emergence of the state without the fundamental problems being resolved beforehand (Gros 1996: 458-461).

C.T. Call (2011) proposes an alternative conceptual framework where he separates the shortcomings of a failed state along three conceptional dimensions: legitimacy, capacity and security. This allows for a classification of failed states according to three 'gaps' and exposes different solutions for illegitimate states, weak states and war-torn states:

The legitimacy gap This does not refer to an external legitimacy gap but to illegitimate states. This lack of regime legitimacy concerns the rejection by the political elites and society of "the rules regulating the exercise of power and the accumulation and distribution of wealth." So, only internal legitimacy matters for this analysis, and this gap is the most difficult to conceptualize and operationalize due to these states' lack of transparency and propaganda (Call 2011: 308).

The capacity gap This is a narrower interpretation of weak states and refers to "the degree that state institutions are able to provide or regulate the minimal provision of core public goods." It is not about state institutions being capable, but whether they effectively provide security, rule of law, public finance management, and minimal public goods such as primary education and basic health care – in other words, whether they uphold the social contract (Call 2011: 306).

The security gap refers to the condition when states do not provide minimal levels of security in the face of organized armed groups. A situation thus found in war-torn societies. Territories can be at war or linger in such conditions post-conflict. In this concept, Call particularly incorporates "the effects of war on infrastructure, social trust, displacement of persons, human right abuses, and contested authority." (Call 2011: 307).

MEASUREMENT By its very nature, measuring state fragility is of most interest to national governments and international organizations in areas related to security and development assistance. Many different organizations are working on fragile state metrics. Many not only use different criteria to assess state weakness, but the majority create their own rankings. We focus on some of the most notable indices. The first index comes from the OECD and is known as the States of Fragility data platform. The OECD has developed this multidimensional fragility framework to guide effective action in fragile contexts. It assesses risks and coping capacities across six dimensions: economic, environmental, human, political, security and societal. Since 2015, the States of Fragility reports have sought to understand better the implications of fragility for international stability and development. OECD combines 44 indicators from conflict incidents to social protection and food security. All reports can be found on the OECD website (OECD 2022).

The World Bank also has its own methodology, identifying 'fragile and conflict-affected states' (FCS), with an updated list being released annually since 2006. The list functions primarily as a tool to help the World Bank adapt its approaches, policies, and instruments in difficult and complex environments. The latest list of FCS countries contains 17 conflict-affected countries and 20 other countries falling into the category of 'Institutional and Social Fragility' (World Bank 2023b).

The most well-known and discussed ranking measuring state fragility over the past almost two decades is the Fragile State Index – a project of the Washington, DC-based think-tank Fund for Peace. Since 2005, the index has been published on the organization's website and in Foreign Policy magazine. The original title until 2013 was the Failed States Index, but since 2014, the annual report has been published under the current title, better reflecting its scope (currently 179 UN members) and no longer just those cases that are experiencing state failure, like before. Their yearly report is widely cited by academics, journalists and practitioners to make broad comparative points about individual countries and regions. The report uses both qualitative and quantitative measures to gauge 12 main indicators (security apparatus, Factionalized Elites, Group Grievance, Economic Decline, Uneven Economic Development, Human Flight and Brain Drain, State Legitimacy, Public Services, Human Rights and Rule of Law, Demographic Pressures, Refugees and IDPs and External Intervention). Each indicator is rated (best-worst) on a scale of 0–10, with the sum of the scores providing an overall score for comparative country rankings. The first places are thus occupied by countries that most closely match collapsed states.

Other rankings of failed or fragile states that have resonated in the public sphere over the past 20 years or so include, e.g., State Fragility Index (Center for Systemic Peace), Country Indicators for Foreign Policy (Carlton University and CIDA) and Index of State Weakness in the Developing World (Brookings Institution). For a discussion about issues of measurement and methodology, see Kaplan 2014; Brinkerhoff 2019.

EXAMPLES There are many examples of failed/fragile states in recent years. In the last decade, the countries that have most consistently been ranked at the top of the FSI have been Yemen, Somalia, Syria, South Sudan, the Central African Republic, the Democratic Republic of Congo, Sudan, Afghanistan, Chad and Myanmar.

OTHER LANGUAGES The most important books and academic articles on this topic have appeared in English, being the lingua franca of most international organizations and think tanks, from which policy papers and donor strategies originate. However, there exist some well-known and widely cited works in French (Bellina et al. 2010; Gaulme 2011), Spanish (Gutiérrez-Sanín 2010; Zapata Callejas 2014) and in German (Schneckener 2004; Bethke 2012).

NEW FRONTIERS Why is it still relevant to discuss failed/fragile states when the concept has been so often criticized? The answer is simple because it continues to be used in policies on conflict, security and development. State fragility also represents one of the significant challenges to achieving the UN Sustainable Development Goals. Though the failed and fragile state concepts are unstable and evolve, they may help shape our understanding of problems, and consequently also how to forge possible solutions. The questions of how to reduce internal state instability, what its causes are, the causal relations between failing institutions and corruption, the security issues, and the economic underdevelopment of the state remain relevant. Future research should continue to analyze the trends and assess their relationship with specific dimensions of state failure. This is meaningful despite the fact that in the field of weak statehood, there is still no widely accepted consensus among academics and practitioners working in basic and applied research on methodological and conceptual issues.

How to cite:

Hoch, Tomáš, 2025. State Fragility and Failure, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bellina, S., Darbon, D., Erkisen, S.S., Sending, O.J., 2010. L'Etat en quête de légitimité: sortir collectivement des situations de fragilité. Éditions Charles Léopold Mayer.

Bethke, F.S., 2012. Zuverlässig invalide–Indizes zur Messung fragiler Staatlichkeit. Zeitschrift für vergleichende Politikwissenschaft, 6:1.

Bøås, M. and Jennings, K.M., 2007. 'Failed states' and 'state failure': Threats or opportunities? Globalizations, 4:4.

Brinkerhoff, D.W., 2019. State fragility, international development policy, and global responses. In The Oxford Handbook of Global Policy and Transnational Administration. Oxford University Press.

Brinkerhoff, D.W., 2014. State fragility and failure as wicked problems: beyond naming and taming. Third World Quarterly, 35:2.

Call, C.T., 2008. The fallacy of the 'Failed State'. Third World Quarterly, 29:8.

Call, C.T., 2011. Beyond the 'failed state': Toward conceptual alternatives. European journal of international relations, 17:2.

Chandler, D.C., 2006. Empire in denial: the politics of state-building. Pluto.

Chauvet, L. and Collier, P., 2005. Alternatives to Godot: Inducing Turnarounds in Failing States. Centre for the Study of African Economies, Oxford University.

Clapham, C., 2003. The Challenge to the State in a Globalized World. In State Failure, Collapse and Reconstruction. Blackwell Publishing.

DFID, 2005. Why We Need to Work More Effectively in Fragile States. Department for International Development.

Dingli, S., 2013. Is the failed state thesis analytically useful? The case of Yemen. Politics, 33:2.

EU Public Group on Fragility and Crisis Situations, 2023. The New Deal for Engagement in Fragile States.

Ezrow, N. and Frantz, E., 2013. Revisiting the Concept of the Failed State: bringing the state back in. Third World Quarterly, 34:8.

Fragile State Index, 2022. Fragilestatesindex.org.

Gaulme, F., 2011. États faillis, États fragiles: concepts jumelés d›une nouvelle réflexion mondiale. Politique étrangère, 1.

Gjerløw, H., Knutsen, C.H., Wig, T. and Wilson, M.C., 2021. One Road to Riches? How State Building and Democratization Affect Economic Development. Cambridge University Press.

Gros, J. G., 1996. Towards a Taxonomy of Failed States in the New World Order: Decaying Somalia, Liberia, Rwanda and Haiti. Third World Quarterly, 17:3.

Gutiérrez-Sanín, F., 2010. ¿Estados fallidos o conceptos fallidos? La clasificación de las fallas estatales y sus problemas. Revista de Estudios sociales, 37.

Iqbal, Z. and Starr, H., 2015. State Failure in the Modern World, Stanford University Press.

Jackson, R.H. and Rosberg, C.G., 1982. Why Africa's Weak States Persist: The Empirical and the Juridical in Statehood. World Politics, 35:1.

Kaplan, S., 2014. Identifying truly fragile states. Washington Quarterly, 37:1.

Krasner, S.D., 2004. Sharing sovereignty: New institutions for collapsed and failing states. International security, 29:2.

Kraxberger, B.M., 2007. Failed states: temporary obstacles to democratic diffusion or fundamental holes in the world political map? Third World Quarterly, 28:6.

Milliken, J. and Krause, K., 2003. State Failure, State Collapse and State Reconstruction: Concept, Lessons and Strategies. In State Failure, Collapse and Reconstruction. Blackwell Publishing.

Myrdal, G., 1968. Asian drama: An Inquiry into the Poverty of Nations. Pantheon.

Nay, O., 2013. Fragile and failed states: Critical perspectives on conceptual hybrids. International Political Science Review, 34:3.

OECD, 2007. The Principles for Good International Engagement in Fragile States. Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development.

OECD, 2022. States of Fragility, 2022. Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development.

OECD/DAC, 2007. Principles for Good International Engagement in Fragile States and Situations. Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development/Development Assistance Committee.

Patrick, S., 2006. Weak States and Global Threats: Fact or Fiction? Washington Quarterly, 29:2.

Rotberg, R.I., 2003. Failed States, Collapsed States, Weak States: Causes and Indicators. In State Failure and State Weakness in a Time of Terror. Brookings Institution Press.

Sachs, J.D., 2003. The Strategic Significance of Global Inequality. ECSP Report 9. Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars, Environmental Change and Security Program.

Schneckener, U., 2004. States at Risk: fragile Staaten als Sicherheits- und Entwicklungsproblem. SWP Studie, 43. Stiftung für Wissenschaft und Politik.

Sørensen, G., 1999. A State Is Not a State: Types of Statehood and Patterns of Conflict after the Cold War. In International Security Management and the United Nations. UN Press.

Takeyh, R. and Gvosdev, N., 2002. Do Terrorist Networks Need a Home? Washington Quarterly, 25:3.

World Bank, 2023a. Low-Income Countries Under Stress (LICUS).

World Bank, 2023b. Classification of Fragile and Conflict-Affected Situations.

Zapata Callejas, J.S., 2014. La teoría del Estado fallido: entre aproximaciones y disensos. Revista de Relaciones Internacionales, Estrategia y Seguridad, 9:1.

Zartman, I.W., 1995. Introduction: Posing the Problem of State Collapse. In Collapsed States: The Disintegration and Restoration of Legitimate Authority. Lynne Rienner.

Box 7.8 Piracy – The Case of Somalia

In politics and in trade, bruisers and pirates are of better promise than talkers and clerks.
– Ralph Waldo Emerson (1803-1882)

Piracy in Somalia emerged in the early 1990s following the collapse of Siad Barre's regime. Initially concentrated in northeast Somalia and near the southern port of Kismayo, piracy grew steadily throughout the decade. In its early stages, Somali pirates primarily targeted small fishing vessels. However, by the late 1990s, their tactics had evolved to include the capture of large commercial ships traveling to ports like Mogadishu and Kismayo (Marchal 2011).

By 2008, Somali piracy had become a significant threat to international shipping routes along the Somali coast. The introduction of 'mother ships' allowed pirates to extend their operational range far beyond coastal waters, further endangering global maritime trade (Guilfoyle 2012; Percy & Shortland 2013b). This escalation drew the attention of the international community, prompting coordinated responses to address the crisis.

The United Nations Security Council (UNSC) authorized anti-piracy military operations, resulting in collaborative efforts led by NATO (Combined Task Force-151) and the European Union (EU NAVFOR). Additionally, individual states such as China, Russia, India, and South Korea joined these efforts (Guilfoyle 2012). The EU's maritime operation, Operation Atalanta, played a central role in combating piracy. It worked closely with regional states like Kenya, Seychelles, and Mauritius to enhance security and prosecute captured pirates (Karawita 2019; Reisman 2009). These coordinated actions marked a significant international effort to curb piracy off the Somali coast.

One of the main factors contributing to Somali piracy was the collapse of the Somali state in the early 1990s (Beri 2011; Murphy 2013; Bahadur 2012; Samatar et al. 2010). The fall of Siad Barre's regime led to a breakdown in law and order, leaving Somalia's coastal waters unprotected and vulnerable to criminal activity. In the absence of a functioning government, pirates operated with relative impunity, becoming a significant threat to international shipping in the region.

Following the first phase of the Somali civil war, characterized by violent clashes between clan-based militias, the Transitional Federal Government (TFG) was established in 2004 through negotiations led by the Intergovernmental Authority on Development (IGAD). However, the TFG struggled to gain local support or control Somali territory. By 2006, the Islamic Courts Union (ICU) had taken control of Mogadishu and much of southern Somalia. Despite their initial success in establishing order, the ICU was ousted later that year by Ethiopian forces and TFG troops (Menkhaus 2007). The TFG remained weak and illegitimate in the eyes of many Somalis while facing insurgent threats from groups like al-Shabaab (Beri 2011).

In subsequent years, a new government was formed with protection from the African Union Mission in Somalia (AMISOM). However, piracy continued to rise despite international efforts to combat it (Besteman 2017; Karawita 2019). According to Percy & Shortland (2013a: 65), five key obstacles hindered effective anti-piracy measures: (a) lack of alternative employment opportunities for locals. (b) Corruption within local governance structures. (c) The nature of piracy victims (e.g., foreign commercial ships). (d) Practices by some shipping companies and insurers inadvertently incentivizing piracy. (e) Pirates' ability to innovate in response to enforcement efforts.

According to Keating (2013: 185), Somali piracy can be explained by two primary factors: (i) the collapse of the Somali state, which created a power vacuum conducive to pirate networks, and (ii) the pirates' development of a successful business model that exploited the vulnerabilities of maritime trade. Hastings and Phillips (2015) analyzed this business model, linking it to both formal and informal institutions in Somalia, particularly the clan system. Shortland and Varese (2016) emphasize that Somali piracy would not have been possible without the coordination and support of clans, local elites, and governments along the Somali coast.

The root causes of Somali piracy are complex and multifaceted. They include poverty, unemployment, deprivation in coastal communities, limited economic opportunities (Jablonski & Oliver 2013), and regional conflicts and instability. Pirates themselves often justified their actions as a response to illegal fishing and toxic waste dumping in Somali waters, portraying themselves as 'coast guards' protecting national resources (Hansen 2012; Guilfoyle 2012; Hastings & Phillips 2015). These grievances date back to Siad Barre's regime, which granted fishing concessions to the Somali High Seas Fishing Company (SHIFCO) – a company later privatized after Barre's fall. During the 1990s, SHIFCO monopolized Somali fishing through political corruption (Marchal 2011).

Despite these justifications, piracy was exacerbated by Somalia's political instability. Warlords used piracy revenues to fund militias in the 1990s and early 2000s (West 2006; Hastings 2009). The Islamic Courts Union (ICU), which briefly governed Somalia in 2006, banned piracy under Sharia law (Murphy 2013; Jablonski & Oliver 2013). However, after the ICU was ousted by Ethiopian and TFG forces, pirate attacks surged dramatically in 2008 (Coggins 2016). The TFG and subsequent governments were accused of corruption, human rights abuses, and resource mismanagement. Some members of these governments and Puntland elites allegedly supported piracy directly or indirectly in exchange for profits, creating what Menkhaus (2009) described as a 'pirate version of a narco-state' (International Crisis Group 2009; Murphy 2011; Bahadur 2012; Marchal 2011). Piracy revenues were even used for local development projects in Puntland cities like Garowe (Karawita 2019) and provided new job opportunities (Percy & Shortland 2013a).

While many policymakers argue that Somalia's state collapse created an anarchic haven for pirates (Pham 2011), scholars like Coggins (2016) and Percy & Shortland (2013b) contend that anarchy alone is insufficient for organized criminal activities like piracy. Instead, a degree of local governance is necessary for pirate groups to operate effectively. Mantzikos (2011) similarly argues that weak states – not failed ones – provide the infrastructure needed for networks like pirates or terrorist groups to function. In fully anarchic environments, such groups risk betrayal or lack access to essential resources. Besides that, Mantzikos discussed the possible connection between pirates and Islamist groups in Yemen and Somalia and found that they are entangled in an informal network of 'win-win' situations (Mantzikos 2011: 256). Hastings and Phillips (2015) also found that piracy thrived in areas with greater degrees of 'semi-formal governing capacity' and less violence, such as Puntland and central Somalia.

Hastings (2009: 213) finds that "state failure is associated with less logistically sophisticated hijackings (kidnappings for ransom), while state weakness encourages more sophisticated attacks (those where the ship and cargo are seized and sold)." Percy and Shortland (2013b) argue that Somali piracy is an "organized criminal activity and benefits from increased stability." Therefore, it is very difficult to control it, and the international activities to combat it on the sea are not sufficient.

Regional variations further illustrate this dynamic. Puntland became a stronghold for piracy due to its weak governance structures, while Somaliland successfully suppressed piracy along its coast. Hastings and Phillips (2018) attribute Somaliland's success not to strong state institutions but to a discourse emphasizing Somaliland's inherent order compared to southern Somalia's disorder. They challenge the assumption that the strength of institutions is correlated with the level of order/disorder, which is presented by the 'state failure' literature (e.g., Rotberg 2003) and instead, puts emphasis on the creation of 'national' identities of Somalilanders in contrast to southern Somalia.

This contrasts with Daxecker & Prins' findings that improvements in governance generally reduce piracy risks by enabling states to project force effectively. They note that poorly guarded ports and underpaid security personnel create conditions where piracy flourishes. Furthermore, they argue that regime type matters: democracies with low state fragility reduce piracy attacks, whereas fragile democracies experience higher levels of piracy (Daxecker & Prins 2013).

Somali piracy also had significant implications for international law-making (especially 'soft law'). Guilfoyle (2012) highlights how it contributed to a shift from military responses to law enforcement operations, fostered transnational coordination against piracy, and redirected efforts from sea-based operations to land-based interventions.

In summary, Somali piracy emerged from a combination of socioeconomic deprivation, political instability, weak governance structures, and external grievances like illegal fishing. Its persistence was enabled by local elites' complicity and semi-formal governing arrangements in regions like Puntland. While international efforts have targeted piracy at sea, addressing its root causes on land remains critical for long-term solutions.

How to cite:

Ženková Rudincová, Kateřina, 2025, Piracy – The Case of Somalia, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bahadur, J., 2011. The pirates of Somalia: Inside their hidden world. Vintage.

Beri, R., 2011. Piracy in Somalia: Addressing the root causes. Strategic Analysis, 35:3.

Besteman, C., 2017. Experimenting in Somalia: The new security empire. Anthropological Theory, 17:3.

Coggins, B.L., 2016. Failing and the seven seas? Somali piracy in global perspective. Journal of Global Security Studies, 1:4.

Daxecker, U.E. and Prins, B.C., 2015. Searching for sanctuary: government power and the location of maritime piracy. International Interactions, 41:4.

Daxecker, U. and Prins, B., 2013. Insurgents of the sea: Institutional and economic opportunities for maritime piracy. Journal of conflict resolution, 57:6.

Guilfoyle, D., 2012. Somali Pirates as Agents of Change in International Law-making and Organisation. Cambridge Journal of International and Comparative Law, 1:3.

Hansen, S.J., 2012. The dynamics of Somali piracy. Studies in conflict & terrorism, 35:7-8.

Hastings, J.V., 2009. Geographies of state failure and sophistication in maritime piracy hijackings. Political Geography, 28:4.

Hastings, J.V. and Phillips, S.G., 2015. Maritime piracy business networks and institutions in Africa. African Affairs, 114:457.

Hastings, J.V. and Phillips, S.G., 2018. Order beyond the state: explaining Somaliland's avoidance of maritime piracy. The Journal of Modern African Studies, 56:1.

International Crisis Group. 2009. Somalia: The Trouble with Puntland.

Jablonski, R.S. and Oliver, S., 2013. The political economy of plunder: Economic opportunity and modern piracy. Journal of conflict resolution, 57:4.

Karawita, A.K., 2019. Piracy in Somalia: An analysis of the challenges faced by the international community. Jurnal Ilmu Sosial dan Ilmu Politik, 23:2.

Keating, T., 2013. The political economy of Somali piracy. SAIS Review of International Affairs, 33:1.

Mantzikos, I., 2011. Somalia and Yemen: the links between terrorism and state failure. Digest of Middle East Studies, 20:2.

Marchal, R., 2011. Somali piracy: The local contexts of an international obsession. Humanity: An International Journal of Human Rights, Humanitarianism, and Development, 2:1.

Menkhaus, K., 2007. The crisis in Somalia: Tragedy in five acts. African Affairs, 106:424.

Menkhaus, K., 2009. Dangerous waters. Survival, 51:1.

Murphy, M.N., 2011. Somalia, the new Barbary?: Piracy and Islam in the Horn of Africa. Columbia University Press.

Murphy, M.N., 2013. Contemporary piracy and maritime terrorism: the threat to international security. Routledge.

Percy, S. and Shortland, A., 2013a. Contemporary maritime piracy: Five obstacles to ending Somali piracy. Global Policy, 4:1.

Percy, S. and Shortland, A., 2013b. The business of piracy in Somalia. Journal of Strategic Studies, 36:4.

Pham, J. Peter. 2011. 'The Plagues of Somalia'. Text. The National Interest. The Center for the National Interest.

Reisman, W.M. and Tennis, B.T., 2009. Combating Piracy in East Africa. The Yale Journal of International Law Online, 35.

Rotberg, R.I., ed., 2004. State failure and state weakness in a time of terror. Rowman & Littlefield.

Samatar, A.I., Lindberg, M. and Mahayni, B., 2010. The Dialectics of Piracy in Somalia: the rich versus the poor. Third World Quarterly, 31:8.

Shortland, A. and Varese, F., 2016. State-building, informal governance and organised crime: the case of Somali piracy. Political Studies, 64:4.

West, S., 2006. Somalia's Islamists Attempt to Rein in Pirates. Terrorism Focus, 33:3

Terrorism & Regime Promotion

Terrorism is the war of the poor, and war is the terrorism of the rich.
– Peter Ustinov (1921-2004), British actor, writer, filmmaker, and humanitarian Terrorism is the tactic of demanding the impossible, and demanding it at gunpoint.

– Christopher Hitchens (1949-2011), British-American author

Terrorism as asymmetric warfare and its effects on different autocratic regime types are covered in the main entry: terrorist groups. This entry is complementary and briefly highlights how terrorism relates to authoritarian ideologies and how it affects regime promotion and other behavior in international relations.

The worldviews espoused by autocracies are diverse and evolving; still, in the last century, several ideologies became intricately associated with terrorism. Many terrorist groups emerged as radicalized, militant fractions of larger 'transnational ideological networks' (TINs) in the outer fringes of ideological clusters of regimes, often operating in those territories considered frontlines between ideological camps in global and regional geopolitical competition, aimed at regime promotion and fostering revolution.

During the late 1960s and early 1970s, the internationalization of terrorism was partly influenced by the Palestinian plight and the emergence of left-wing revolutionary movements in Europe and North America. These groups were driven by Marxist-Leninist ideology, aiming to overthrow capitalist systems and turn states to communism or socialism. They frequently targeted government institutions, corporations, and individuals (e.g., kidnapping, assassination), which they viewed as symbols of capitalist exploitation and oppression. Notable examples include the Rote Armee Fraktion ('Red Army Faction' or Baader-Meinhof Gang) in Germany, the Brigate Rosse ('Red Brigades') in Italy, and the FARC ('Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia,' 1964-2017). Older ideology-motivated terrorist groups aiming for violent revolution and regime change were the various anarchist movements (anarchism) seeking to overthrow monarchies, empires, and state power.

In parallel, one finds the ethno-nationalist or separatist movements that engaged in 'modern' terrorism. In the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, as nationalist movements sought independence from empires and colonial rule, the use of terrorism emerged as a strategy for militant groups who perceived violence as the only viable means of undermining imperial or colonial powers and galvanizing international support. The asymmetrical nature of these conflicts made terrorism appealing: it was a low-cost but highly visible way to challenge better-armed imperial overlords or colonial rulers (spectacle terrorism) (Wilkinson 1974).

The oldest colony in Europe is a prime example, ultimately culminating in the Irish War of Independence (1919-1921) with various generations of Irish Republican Army (IRA) fighters engaged in different causes. For Africa, the Algerian National Liberation Front (FLN 1954-1962) used bombings and assassinations against French colonial forces to draw attention to Algeria's independence cause, while the Mau Mau uprising (1952-1960) in Kenya deployed violent insurgency tactics against the British to the same effect. Other famous examples emerged in the South African anti-Apartheid struggle (1961-1994), like some factions of the African National Congress (ANC) or the armed wing of the Azanian People's Organization (AZAPO) (for more on Apartheid, see Box 4.7). Other examples are the Basque separatist group ETA (Basque Homeland and Liberty, 1959-2011) and the Tamil Tigers in Sri Lanka (1976-2009).

These anti-colonial and separatist movements influenced one another worldwide by legitimizing terrorism as a tactic for political change and borrowing tactics. For instance, the Irish Republican Brotherhood (1858) was one of the earliest groups to use time-delayed explosive devices, allowing for escape and campaign sustainment. This innovation, along with their establishment of foreign bases, became a hallmark of twentieth-century terrorism. The Palestinian Liberation Organization's (PLO) success in using hijackings and attacks on international targets to publicize their cause and gain political recognition had a profound impact on the evolution of terrorism. In addition, the PLO, seeking to advance their own goals and foster revolutionary alliances, provided training and logistical support to various terrorist groups from around the world, including the Rote Armee Fraktion in Germany (Hoffman 2006; Chaliand & Blin 2007; Wilkinson 1974).

Probably the oldest form is religious-motivated terror, framed as existential struggles between good and evil, with each side believing that their cause was divinely sanctioned. Such ideology-driven violence is deeply associated with religious wars during previous waves of regime promotion (Owen IV 2010) and with some of the earliest insurrections in the age of empire, like the original 'zealots' (first century CE) or the first 'assassins' (1090 – ca. 1275 CE). In modern times, theocracies (like Iran or the Taliban) enabled and supported religious terrorism as a more prominent feature of the international landscape in the 1980s, culminating in the rise of al-Qaeda or the Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant (ISIL), who themselves also instrumentalized terror (Box 3.13) in their efforts of state-building (Islamic States).

Terrorism has generally been ineffective in achieving regime change or revolution, with few exceptions. While it can generate fear and disruption, most terrorist groups have failed to achieve their stated political goals. Anti-colonial movements, such as the FLN in Algeria or the Irgun (a Jewish nationalist-liberation movement, 1931-1948) in Palestine, are notable exceptions where terrorism played a role in broader campaigns for independence. However, these successes were influenced by factors like the weakening of colonial powers, international support, and shifting public opinion against colonialism (Chaliand & Blin 2007; Hoffman 2006).

Even in these cases, terrorism was not the decisive factor; it was part of a larger strategy that included guerrilla warfare, political mobilization, and diplomacy. Terrorism is more likely to provoke repression than revolution, especially when targeting autocratic regimes, as governments often respond with increased security measures and crackdowns on dissent. Additionally, indiscriminate violence can alienate potential supporters and undermine a movement's legitimacy (Chaliand & Blin 2007).

Alternative strategies like peaceful protests, coups, and guerrilla warfare (rebellion) have historically been more effective in achieving regime change. While terrorism can destabilize leaders or electoral autocracies, it rarely leads to regime transformation and often fails to produce long-term political gains (Adam & Tsavou 2022).

The end of the Cold War (and the end of bipolar ideological confrontation) has reduced the availability of funding for terrorist organizations, resulting in a decline of left-wing terrorist groups, with many turning to organized crime as an alternative form of income. Rapid changes in technology and global financing also facilitated their transnational transformations (Mahan & Griset 2008: 104). Radicalized factions among several strands of political Islam still drive terrorism today, especially in areas with protracted conflicts. The COVID-19 pandemic and its related restrictions in high-capacity states (like Western Europe) have shifted terrorist activities and their centers to West Africa, the Sahel and Southeast Asia. (Hedayah 2022). A comprehensive, recent global overview of terrorist organizations can be found in Romaniuk et al. 2024.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Terrorism and Regime Promotion, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adam, A. and Tsavou, E., 2022. One Strike and You're out… Dictators' Fate in the Aftermath of Terrorism. Defence and Peace Economics, 33:5.

Chaliand, G. and Blin, A., 2007. The History of Terrorism: From Antiquity of Al Qaeda. Berkeley. University of California Press

Hedayah, 2022. The Reshaping of the Terrorist and Extremist Landscape in a Post Pandemic World.

Hoffman, B., 2006. Inside Terrorism (revised and expanded edition). Columbia University Press.

Mahan, S. and Griset, P.L., 2008. Terrorism in perspective. Sage publications.

Owen IV, J.M., 2010. The Clash of Ideas in World Politics: Transnational Networks, States, and Regime Change, 1510-2010. Princeton University Press.

Romaniuk, S.N., Roul, A., Fabe, A.P. and Besenyő, J., eds., 2024. Handbook of Terrorist and Insurgent Groups: A Global Survey of Threats, Tactics, and Characteristics. Routledge.

Wilkinson, P., 1974. Political Terrorism. Macmillan Press LTD.

Youth Bulge & Regime Stability

Youth is the best time to be rich, and the best time to be poor.
– Euripides

初生牛犊不怕虎
(chū shēng niú dú bù pà hǔ) (Newborn calves are not afraid of tigers)
– Chinese proverb

The concept of a 'youth bulge' refers to a demographic pattern characterized by a large proportion of young people in a population, especially children, teens, and young adults. This phenomenon is often observed in countries where improved healthcare reduces infant mortality, but fertility rates remain high, leading to a surplus of youth relative to adults. Scholars suggest that youth bulges, particularly when combined with limited job opportunities, can contribute to protests and uprisings and sometimes even conflict.

DEFINITION A youth bulge is a demographic pattern where a large share of the population are children, teens and young adults (Lin 2012). Gunnar Heinsohn (2003) claims that the youth bulge can be defined as when the ratio of adequately prestigious and well-paid jobs is much smaller than the workforce. Thus, countries with a large percentage of young people may also struggle with a high youth unemployment rate.

The youth bulge emerges when infant mortality rates reduce (due to improvements in vaccination distribution and sanitation), but fertility rates remain high. In these countries with high fertility rates, the demographic transition has not fully materialized; there are typically still structural barriers to reducing fertility rates – such as women not being fully integrated into the workforce, having fewer reproductive rights and the need to have large families for social security.

Many countries in the Arab region have been noted for having a significant youth bulge – that is, a large percentage of the population is at least under 30, with high levels of youth unemployment. In the case of Egypt, there are substantial numbers of university graduates who cannot find employment, which has led to frustration and anger after rising expectations of jobs, steady income and class mobility. For some scholars, this atmosphere can lead to greater instability as there is heightened social and political alienation (LaGraffe 2012).

SEE ALSO The youth bulge is often referred to as 'youth surplus' or a large 'youth cohort.' It is one of the subjects of political demography, an interdisciplinary field drawing on political science, sociology, economics, and geography to understand how population dynamics influence political outcomes on both national and international levels. Youth bulges are expected to correlate with protests and uprisings and demands for regime change (revolution) and democratization and thus challenge regime longevity, stability and resilience.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Youth bulges are significant because they are used to predict instability. This is relevant for the revolution and conflict literature, as a youth bulge could be a trigger factor driving and facilitating authoritarian breakdown and/or conflict and terrorism recruitment.

ORIGIN The youth bulge concept is relatively new, but similar theories were introduced decades ago by Herbert Moller (1968) and Gaston Bouthoul (1970). Several decades later, the work by Jack Goldstone highlighted the importance of youth cohorts, and in particular, youth unemployment in leading to instability (1986; 1991; 2001; 2002). Samuel Huntington also embraced the concept and theory in his book The Clash of Civilizations (1996), arguing that youth are an important agent of change. Though Huntington (1996: 261) argued that demographic shifts cannot explain everything, he claimed that "shifts in the demographic balances and youth bulges of 20 percent or more account for many of the inter-civilizational conflicts of the late twentieth century."

LITERATURE There is a significant body of literature that has investigated the impact of a demographic explosion on political stability and authoritarian breakdown. Earlier works noted that revolutions are most likely to take place in countries with large populations of energetic yet frustrated young men (Goldstone 1986; 1991; Kennedy 1993; Moller 1968). Goldstone argued that a large cohort of young men, in particular, desperate for employment could explain nearly all periods of internal unrest in human history, such as the English Revolution of the seventeenth century and the French Revolution of the eighteenth century. Most twenty-century revolutions in developing countries occurred where exceptionally large youth bulges were present (Goldstone 2001; 2002). Iran, for example, went through a demographic explosion before its revolution in 1979 that overthrew the Shah.

Young people are more easily mobilized and are more willing to challenge the status quo (Goldstone 2001; Huntington 2006). Young people are also more risk-acceptant when it comes to challenging dictatorships because they have fewer family and career responsibilities (Collier 2000). Youth also notably participated in the color revolutions and the Arab Spring: The Bulldozer Revolution in Yugoslavia (2000), the Rose Revolution in Georgia (2003), the Orange Revolution in Ukraine (2004), and the Iranian Green Movement (2009-2011) (Diuk 2003) – see also Box 6.4 on 'Flowers, Cloth and Spices.'

In particular, the literature has also focused on the relationship between a large youth bulge and unmet rising expectations – or when youth unemployment is coupled with an expansion of education. Studies find that youth are more likely to be unemployed than other age groups, with global youth (15–24) unemployment standing at almost 15 percent, according to the International Labour Organization (ILO). At the same time, better-educated individuals are more likely to participate in political activities, such as voting or discussing politics, or taking part in more public forms of mobilization, such as protests (Putnam 1995; Sondheimer & Green 2010). As expectations rise, when this is unaccompanied by jobs, high levels of discontent are created. As Huntington (1963: 48) notes, "the higher the level of education of the unemployed (…) the more extreme the destabilizing behaviour which results." The argument is that educated youth cohorts that run into bottlenecks will lead to growing frustrations (Urdal 2006). Youth bulges are also associated with high poverty rates among this segment of the population (Ortiz & Cummins 2012). This adds to youth frustration as another grievance against the state.

Youth bulges often lead to authoritarian breakdown by raising a country's risk of violent conflict (Acemoglu et al. 2017; Raleigh & Urdal 2007). Countries experiencing youth bulges of 35 percent or more of the population are three times more likely to experience violent conflict than countries with demographic structures more similar to developed countries (Urdal 2006). From 1970 to 2007, 80 percent of all outbreaks of conflict occurred in countries where 60 percent or more of the population was younger than 30 (Zakaria 2011).

For the same reason why youth are more likely to join a protest – that they have fewer responsibilities and are more open to new ideas – they are also more likely to join a conflict. High fertility rates and lower child and infant mortality rates ensure the competition over scarce resources, exacerbating grievances leading to conflict (Fuller 2003; Cincotta et al. 2012; Goldstone 2002), greater instability (Goldstone et al. 2014) and violent crime (LaFree & Tseloni 2006; Weber 2019). A youth bulge can harm social cohesion and facilitate social unrest and societal volatility because there are relatively high numbers of unemployed young people (Boyden 2007; Moller 1968). These groups are particularly vulnerable to joining conflicts if the economic and political structures fail to give these groups opportunities to raise demands. In the context of state fragility, there will be greater opportunities for violence (Goldstone 2001). Many scholars have noted that younger people were a source of social unrest, violence and conflict, not just in Europe (Moller 1968; Goldstone 1991) but also in Africa (Peters 2012; Flückiger & Ludwig 2018) and the Middle East (Fuller 2003; Huntington 2000; Hvistendahl 2011; LaGraffe 2012; Roche 2010).

Nevertheless, other studies claim that there is no direct relationship established between a youth bulge causing civil wars (Dhillon & Yousef 2007; Pruitt 2020). Some studies have warned that the youth bulge-conflict relationship all depends on demographic factors. For example, one empirical study showed that the risk of ethnic conflict increases with the presence of a youth bulge (Ahmed et al. 1998), while another has argued that a youth bulge may be more likely to lead only to non-ethnic wars – in countries failing to meet economic demands (Yair & Miodownik 2016).

Other studies have claimed that though a youth bulge may not drive all conflicts per se, it can fuel low-intensity conflicts (Urdal 2006) or affect the intensity of a conflict once it erupts (Mesquida & Wiener 1999). Furthermore, other studies have laid out that the impact of the youth bulge is dependent on how corrupt a government is. Corruption coupled with youth prevalence in excess of 20 percent is destabilizing (Farzanega & Witthuhn 2017). Finally, a recent study has demonstrated that a youth bulge is more important than unemployment rates, arguing that growing youth prevalence and growing educational expansion can lead to increased political violence, even when there is low unemployment (Weber 2019).

Other works have argued that youth bulges do not always produce revolution and violence. The West experienced a demographic bulge in the decades after World War II. Rather than fuel instability, this cohort, known as the 'baby boomers,' became an engine for high levels of economic growth. China and India, likewise, each have a large cohort of young workers that contribute to those countries' economic strength. In the absence of economic growth and employment opportunities, however, a large youth population can make for mass discontent (Zakaria 2011) and increase a country's risk of authoritarian breakdown, and possibly conflict.

MEASUREMENT Most frequently, the youth bulge defines a situation where the population share of those 15–24 years old exceeds 20 percent, and the share of those under 15 (often referred to as the children bulge) is higher than 30 percent. Another commonly used method to measure the youth bulge is to use the size of the youth cohort relative to the adult population. This is the ratio of the population aged 15–24 compared to the ratio of the population aged 15–64.

EXAMPLES Many countries in the Global South have seen their youth bulge decrease, such as Vietnam, China, Indonesia and Brazil, but in the Middle East and Sub Saharan Africa, the youth bulge continues to increase. When looking at the Arab Spring, the role of younger people who were involved in protests and taking to the streets was notable.

The Arab region had an especially higher number of younger people in 2010, with 42 percent of the population falling into this age group compared to the world's average of 35 percent. In 2011, about 60 percent of the Middle East and North Africa's population was under 30 – twice the rate of North America. Moreover, the Arab world had recently experienced a significant expansion in education, and youth unemployment was staggeringly high. Unemployment in the region averaged at least 10 percent, the highest regional rate of joblessness in the world. For the region's young people, however, the unemployment rate was four times the average (Knickmeyer 2011). Likewise, data measuring the average years of schooling in the population aged 15 and over between 1980 and 2010 showed a significant increase in the Arab world and Tunisia, Egypt, and Libya in particular (Barro & Lee 2010). Inadequate economic opportunities for an increasingly young and educated populace, combined with factors such as a significant rise in food prices, played a major role in fueling the Arab Spring and the breakdown of three longstanding autocracies (Campante & Chor 2012).

IMPACT ON POLICY The impact of the youth bulge has been noted by various disciplines in the social sciences. This includes the economic impacts, social impacts, political impacts and security impacts. This has led policymakers to keep a close eye on demographic challenges in assessing political instability risk and to target countries with policies that tackle high fertility rates and unemployment. Major international institutions have looked at the types of skills that young people may need to make them more competitive in the job market and what state policies can help lift unemployment levels and create a stable job market.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Youth Bulge and Regime Stability, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Acemoglu, D., Fergusson, L. and Johnson, S., 2017. Population and civil war. National Bureau of Economic Research, No. w23322.

Ahmed, A., Baechler, G., Bond, D., Brecke, P., Chen, R.S., Cockell, J.G., Dmitrichev, A., Esty, D.C., Gerner, D.J., Goldstone, J. and Gurr, T.R., 1998. Preventive measures: Building risk assessment and crisis early warning systems. Rowman & Littlefield Publishers.

Bouthoul, G., 1970. L'infanticide différé.

Boyden, J., 2007. Children, war and world disorder in the 21st century: a review of the theories and the literature on children's contributions to armed violence: Analysis. Conflict, security & development, 7:2.

Campante, F.R. and Chor, D., 2012. Why was the Arab world poised for revolution? Schooling, economic opportunities, and the Arab Spring. Journal of Economic Perspectives, 26:2.

Cincotta, R., Doces, J., Goldstone, J.A., Kaufmann, E.P. and Toft, M.D., 2012. The age-structural maturity thesis. Political demography, 2012.

Collier, P., 2000. Economic causes of civil conflict and their implications for policy.

Dhillon, N. and Yousef, T., 2007. Inclusion: Meeting the 100 million youth challenge. Wolfensohn Center for Development at the Brookings Institution.

Diuk, N., 2013. Euromaidan: Ukraine's self-organizing revolution. World Affairs, 176.

Farzanegan, M.R. and Witthuhn, S., 2017. Corruption and political stability: Does the youth bulge matter? European Journal of Political Economy, 49.

Flückiger, M. and Ludwig, M., 2018. Youth bulges and civil conflict: causal evidence from Sub-Saharan Africa. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 62:9.

Fuller, G. and Pitts, F.R., 1990. Youth cohorts and political unrest in South Korea. Political Geography Quarterly, 9:1.

Fuller, G.E., 2003. The youth factor: the new demographics of the Middle East and the implications for US policy. Washington: Saban Center for Middle East Policy at the Brookings Institution.

Goldstone, J.A., 1986. State breakdown in the English revolution: A new synthesis. American Journal of Sociology, 92:2.

Goldstone, J.A., 1991. Revolution and Rebellion in the Early Modern Western, Berkeley: University of California Press.

Goldstone, J.A., 2001. Demography, environment and security: an overview. Demography and national security.

Goldstone, J.A., 2002. Population and security: How demographic change can lead to violent conflict. Journal of International Affairs.

Goldstone, J.A., Marshall, M.G. and Root, H., 2014. Demographic growth in dangerous places: Concentrating conflict risks. International Area Studies Review, 17:2.

Heinsohn, G., 2003. Lab for the Unstable Media.

Huntington, S.P., 2000. The clash of civilizations? In Culture and Politics. Palgrave Macmillan.

Huntington, S.P., 2006. Political order in changing societies. Yale University Press.

Hvistendahl, M., 2011. Young and restless can be a volatile mix. Science, 333.

Kennedy, P., 1993. Preparing for the 21st Century. Random House.

Knickmeyer, E., 2011. The Arab World's Youth Army, Meet the Chronically Unemployed Twenty-somethings Fueling Social and Political Upheaval Across the Middle East. Foreign Policy, 1.

LaFree, G. and Tseloni, A., 2006. Democracy and crime: A multilevel analysis of homicide trends in forty-four countries, 1950-2000. The annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 605:1.

LaGraffe, D., 2012. The youth bulge in Egypt: An intersection of demographics, security, and the Arab Spring. Journal of Strategic Security, 5:2.

Lee, R.B.J.W., 2010. Educational attainment in the world, 1950-2010.

Lin, J.Y., 2012. Youth bulge: A demographic dividend or a demographic bomb in developing countries. World Bank.

Mansbach, R.W. and Rhodes, E. eds., 2012. Introducing globalization: analysis and readings. CQ Press.

Mesquida, C.G. and Wiener, N.I., 1999. Male age composition and severity of conflicts. Politics and the life sciences, 18:2.

Moller, H., 1968. Youth as a Force in the Modern World. Comparative studies in society and history, 10:3.

Ortiz, I. and Cummins, M., 2012. When the global crisis and youth bulge collide. Double the Jobs Trouble for Youth. Foresight for Development.

Peters, K., 2012. Youth, wars and violence in West Africa. History Compass, 10:12.

Pruitt, L., 2020. Rethinking youth bulge theory in policy and scholarship: incorporating critical gender analysis. International Affairs, 96:3.

Putnam, R.D., 1995. Tuning in, tuning out: The strange disappearance of social capital in America. PS: Political Science & Politics, 28:4.

Raleigh, C. and Urdal, H., 2007. Climate change, environmental degradation and armed conflict. Political geography, 26:6.

Roche, S., 2010. Domesticating youth: the youth bulge in post-civil war Tajikistan. Doctoral dissertation, Martin-Luther-Universität Halle-Wittenberg Halle/Saale.

Sondheimer, R.M. and Green, D.P., 2010. Using experiments to estimate the effects of education on voter turnout. American Journal of Political Science, 54:1.

Urdal, H., 2006. A clash of generations? Youth bulges and political violence. International studies quarterly, 50:3.

Urdal, H., 2012. Youth bulges and violence. Political demography: How population changes are reshaping international security and national politics, Goldstone, J.A., Kaufmann, E.P. and Duffy Toft, M., eds., Oxford University Press.

Weber, H., 2019. Age structure and political violence: A re-assessment of the "youth bulge" hypothesis. International interactions, 45:1.

Yair, O. and Miodownik, D., 2016. Youth bulge and civil war: Why a country's share of young adults explains only non-ethnic wars. Conflict Management and Peace Science, 33:1.

Zakaria, F., 2011. In the Middle East protests, a seismic shift. Washington Post.

Box 7.9 Youth Rights in Authoritarian Regimes

Currently, young people very much rely on States to promote and protect their rights. However, most States are reluctant to take a progressive stance towards youth rights and therefore the challenges that young people face accessing their rights are almost never remedied.
– Giuseppe Porcaro, Secretary-General of the European Youth Forum

Young people face many challenges, such as exclusion, underrepresentation and lack of access to human rights (Lippert 2021; OSGEY 2021: 1; Thai Lawyers for Human Rights 2020). Paradoxically, the need to engage meaningfully with young people as a specific category of the population with particular needs and interests has not received enough academic attention (Freddy 2017: 14). Human rights of the youth or 'youth rights' represent an under-explored and a contested concept because the concept of youth rights naturally applies to different populations facing different social, economic and political challenges and different sorts and levels of marginalization. All these differences have produced different and often confusing definitions, paving the way for partly overlapping and consequently vague, sometimes even confusing, legal frameworks for the protection of youth rights. In turn, this overlap also poses an additional limitation of the very concept of youth rights in the context of authoritarian regimes, already not conducive to human rights protection in general.

Autocracies often engage with youth to appeal to an active and potentially influential segment of the population (cf. youth bulge & regime stability). However, young people are also frequent targets of authoritarian regimes, facing threats and attacks that manifest through violent repression, both offline and online. These crackdowns often target young activists, peace-builders, and community mobilizers. In response, social movements have emerged to resist the oppression of youth, challenge adultism, advocate for youth rights, and promote meaningful youth participation and partnerships between youth and adults (Angel et al. 2015; Freddy 2017: 14; Krawatzek 2022: 1107).

In examining youth rights within authoritarian and democratic regimes, scholars primarily focus on the social and political struggles faced by young people. They also aim to challenge the inequalities embedded in political and legal systems, as well as the broader social conditions shaping the lives of youth in today's complex contexts. This often involves direct criticism of the structural causes and factors that hinder the realization of youth human rights (Reis & Isidório 2019: 2). However, these efforts take place against the backdrop of a broader crisis in the global appeal of human rights and democratic governance (Regilme 2021).

Human rights universally apply to all individuals, including youth, but age is not explicitly listed as a prohibited ground for discrimination in key international documents like the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) and the International Covenants (1966/1976) (Cardona 2015: xvii). The concept of youth is contested, defined as a transitional phase between childhood and adulthood, with varying age ranges across organizations, such as 15-24 by the UN and 15-35 by the African Union (Ansell 2005; Cardona 2015). This ambiguity creates overlaps with children's rights under the Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), which applies to individuals under 18. While the CRC is significant, it inadequately addresses youth-specific challenges and is sometimes criticized as patronizing (Desmet 2012). Scholars advocate for an 'international law of youth rights' (ILYR) to address youth vulnerabilities and promote equal access to rights (Cardona 2015: xviii), though challenges like tokenism and marginalization persist (Campbell 1992; Jones 2009; Mahidi 2010; Tisdall 2015a/b; Josefsson & Wall 2020).

As young people depend on states to promote and protect their rights both nationally and internationally, it is concerning to observe an increasing reluctance among states to adopt progressive positions on youth and youth rights. This issue is particularly pronounced in authoritarian regimes, which are often "at best hypersensitive, and at worst openly hostile, to rights expressions" (Massoud 2011: 2). Recent reports from international governmental and non-governmental organizations highlight this troubling trend. For instance, United Nations examinations of conflict and post-conflict societies (UNSC 2018) reveal that civic spaces remain unsafe for youth activism. Similarly, reports from organizations such as CIVICUS (2022) identify young people as one of the five social groups most frequently subjected to assaults on fundamental freedoms in their civic participation.

Moreover, as highlighted by the UN Human Rights Office in collaboration with the Office of the UN Secretary General's Envoy on Youth on protecting young people in civic spaces (OSGEY 2021: 6), although individual cases involving threats against young people have been documented, there is a lack of extensive research on the topic and no global reports have been published analyzing "the various forms and gravity of threats, challenges and barriers against diverse groups of youth who are active in the civic space."

In addition, it was emphasized by young participants in this study that political threats and pressures are a huge concern of young people because: "Governments, political leaders and influential actors use sophisticated methods and mechanisms to discourage and suppress young people's right to freedom of expression and peaceful assembly, among others, and we received reports that paramilitary, intelligence and counter-intelligence services interfered, applied further pressure and carried out political persecution and surveillance on behalf of authorities. It should also be mentioned that it is often precisely this hostility and the disappointment in public institutions and actors which push young activists towards informal and/or non-governmental movements and organizations." (OSGEY 2021: 6-7)

Systematic research on youth rights in authoritarian regimes remains limited, and there is relatively little knowledge about youth actions and restrictions on their rights, aside from a few case studies focused on select authoritarian contexts. Authoritarian regimes, or so-called 'authoritarian zones,' pose significant challenges to human rights research, particularly in obtaining reliable data without endangering the individuals involved. Human rights defenders and researchers face heightened risks in these settings, as the regime often targets them. This is especially true when studying young people, who are already considered a vulnerable group in research contexts (Clark et al. 2010).

Conducting empirical research or collecting primary data in authoritarian regimes is particularly difficult due to restricted access for researchers and security risks for both participants and investigators (Hopman 2021: 548). These challenges are compounded by the lack of transparency and the hostile environment created by such regimes. Consequently, certain authoritarian zones remain severely under-researched, to the extent that they effectively "drop off the research map" (Goodhand 2001: 44). This lack of documentation allows some authoritarian regimes to enjoy a degree of impunity, as their actions, including human rights violations, often go unstudied and unrecorded (Hopman 2021: 549).

Scholars have identified certain trends regarding youth rights in authoritarian regimes. For instance, ruling elites in such regimes increasingly recognize the influence of young people both within and beyond their borders. As a result, they often target young diasporas and engage with youth domestically to foster loyalty to the regime (Krawatzek 2022: 1108; Wackenhut & Orjuela 2023). This aligns with Glasius's (2018: 180) observation that authoritarian regimes approach their populations abroad in various ways – repressing and extorting them, co-opting them as clients, or manipulating them as patriots through discourse.

In terms of youth participation, scholars have noted how authoritarian regimes engineer avenues for engagement that recalibrate power dynamics between the younger generation, elite networks, the ruling party, and the state, cf. youth movements. For example, Cambodia's shift toward authoritarianism saw an increase in state-controlled participatory channels designed to reinforce elite dominance rather than secure genuine political or social representation for ordinary youth (Norén-Nilsson 2021; Vong 2022). These channels primarily served as arenas for reproducing existing power structures, with expanded youth participation often tied to the mass mobilization of civil servants (Norén-Nilsson 2021: 275). This demonstrates that mobilizing youth participation in such contexts is less about empowering young people or securing their rights and more about sustaining or enhancing the regime's power.

These scholarly findings are particularly thought-provoking given the longstanding popularity of research on the effectiveness of international pressure in improving human rights records in authoritarian regimes. Since the 1990s, this topic has been central to studies in international law, politics, and international relations (Schmitz & Sikkink 2013; Dudai 2019). However, the potential of human rights to drive social and political change remains a point of contention among scholars (Hawkins 1997). Notably, there is a tendency in the literature to overemphasize the perceived positive and liberal aspects of soft interventions by human rights advocates and organizations (DeMars & Dijkzeul 2015; Berger et al. 2022).

This bias is partly rooted in an over-reliance on 'naming and shaming' strategies in human rights research, which have become conventional wisdom among lawyers, diplomats, policymakers, and even transnational networks and activists (Keck & Sikkink, 1998). The widespread acceptance of this liberal constructivist approach has contributed to its popularity not only among scholars but also among practitioners. Massoud (2011: 6) notes that some researchers have even begun to overstate the counter-hegemonic nature of social activism around human rights and its role in empowering marginalized groups such as youth in authoritarian regimes (Golub 2006; Sepúlveda Carmona & Donald 2015).

For these reasons, scholars have emphasized the need for caution, even when promoting well-established human rights practices such as youth human rights education in authoritarian contexts – a common activity of international human rights NGOs. While internalizing international human rights discourse and engaging in human rights education, often framed through narratives of positive empowerment, can provide young activists with valuable opportunities, global connections, and access to discursive and financial resources unavailable through governments or private businesses, such efforts carry significant risks in authoritarian regimes.

In these contexts, young people who openly criticize their lack of rights are often perceived as threats to the regime's power, which can provoke violent and even fatal retaliation by the state (Bob 2002; Sika 2019). Additionally, foreign engagement based on human rights can have unintended consequences for youth in authoritarian settings. For instance, regimes may co-opt the discourse and tactics of youth movements while intensifying surveillance and repression of individual activists, thereby suppressing resistance and further entrenching authoritarian control (Massoud 2011: 3).

How to cite:

Hedžet, Ajda and Roter, Petra, 2025. Youth Rights in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Angel, W.D., 1995. The International Law of Youth Rights: Source Documents and Commentary, Cardona, J., Porcaro, G., Weuro, J. et al. eds., Martinus Nijhoff Publishers.

Angel, W.D., Cardona, J., Porcaro, G., et al., 2015. The International Law of Youth Rights. Hotei Publishing.

Ansell, N., 2005. Children, Youth and Development. Routledge.

Arce, M.C., 2012. Towards an emancipatory discourse of children's rights. The International Journal of Children's Rights, 20:3.

Berger, T, Holzscheiter, A, Jetschke, A, et al., 2022. New Perspectives on Transnational Non-State Actors – A Forum Honoring the Work of Thomas Risse. International Studies Review, 24:3.

Bob, C., 2002. Political process theory and transnational movements: Dialectics of protest among Nigeria's Ogoni minority. Social Problems, 49:3.

Campbell, T.D., 1992. The rights of the minor: As person, as child, as juvenile, as future adult. International Journal of Law, Policy and the Family, 6:1.

Cardona, J., 2015. The Specification of the International Human Rights of Youth. In The International Law of Youth Rights, Angel W.D., ed., Brill Nijhoff.
CIVICUS, 2022. People Power Under Attack.
Clark, N, Hunt, S, Jules, G, et al.., 2010. Ethical dilemmas in community-based research: Working with vulnerable youth in rural communities. Journal of Academic Ethics, 8.
DeMars, W.E. and Dijkzeul, D., 2015. Introduction: NGOing. In The NGO Challenge for International Relations Theory. Routledge.
Desmet, E., 2012. Implementing the Convention on the Rights of the Child for 'youth': Who and how? International Journal of Children's Rights, 20:1.
Dudai, R., 2019. The Study of Human Rights Practice: State of the Art. Journal of Human Rights Practice, 11:2.
European Youth Forum, 2017. Introduction: Promoting youth rights.
Freddy, H.J., 2017. Understanding Youth Rights. Conflict and Youth Rights in India: Engagement and Identity in the North East. Springer.
Glasius, M., 2018. Extraterritorial authoritarian practices: A framework. Globalizations, 15:2.
Golub, S., 2006. The legal empowerment alternative. Promoting the rule of law abroad: In search of knowledge, 161. Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.
Goodhand, J., 2001. Violent conflict, poverty and chronic poverty. Chronic Poverty Research Centre Working Paper, 6.
Hawkins, D.G., 1997. Domestic responses to international pressure: Human rights in authoritarian Chile. European Journal of International Relations, 3:4.
Hopman, M.J., 2021. Covert qualitative research as a method to study human rights under authoritarian regimes. Journal of Human Rights Practice, 13:3.
Jones, G., 2009. Youth. Polity.
Josefsson, J. and Wall, J., 2020. Empowered inclusion: theorizing global justice for children and youth. Globalizations, 17:6.
Keck, M.E. and Sikkink, K., 1998. Activists beyond Borders. Cornell University Press.
Krawatzek, F., 2022. A Sign of Things to Come? Youth and Politics: Regimes, Values and Agency. Europe-Asia Studies.
Lippert, P., 2021. Thailand's Youth between Protest and Repression.
Mahidi, M., 2010. the Young and the Rightless? The Protection of Youth Rights.
Massoud, M.F., 2011. Do victims of war need international law? Human rights education programs in authoritarian Sudan. Law & Society Review, 45:1.
Norén-Nilsson, A., 2021. Youth mobilization, power reproduction and Cambodia's authoritarian turn. Contemporary Southeast Asia, 43:2.
OSGEY, 2021.If I Disappear: Global Report on Protecting Young People in Civic Space. Office of the Secretary-General's Envoy on Youth.
Porcaro, G., 2015. Preface to the new edition. In The International Law of Youth Rights, Angel W.D. ed., Brill Nijhoff.
Regilme, Jr. S.S.F., 2021. Contested spaces of illiberal and authoritarian politics: Human rights and democracy in crisis. Political Geography, 89.
Reis, M. and Isidório, M.S., 2019. Human Rights for Children and Youth: Sociocultural Differentiation, Resistance and Unity.
Schmitz, H.P. and Sikkink, K., 2013. International Human Rights. In Handbook of International Relations, Carlsnaes N.W., Risse T., and Simmons B.A., eds., Sage Publications Ltd.
Sepúlveda, Carmona, M. and Donald, K., 2015. Beyond legal empowerment: improving access to justice from the human rights perspective. The International Journal of Human Rights, 19:3.
Sika, N., 2019. Repression, cooptation, and movement fragmentation in authoritarian regimes: Evidence from the youth movement in Egypt. Political Studies, 67:3.
Sukarieh, M. and Tannock, S., 2015. Youth Rising?: The Politics of Youth in the Global Economy. Thai Lawyers for Human Rights., 2020. Students making three-finger salute wearing white bows led to 103 reports of harassment in 3 days.
Tisdall, E.K.M., 2015a. Addressing the Challenges of Children and Young People's Participation: Considering Time and Space. In International Perspectives and Empirical Findings on Child Participation: From Social Exclusion to Child-Inclusive Policies, Gal, T. and Duramy, B., eds., Oxford University Press.
Tisdall, E.K.M., 2015b. Children and young people's participation. Routledge international handbook of children's rights studies. Routledge Abingdon.
Vong, M., 2022. State Mobilization in Authoritarian Regimes: Youth Politics and Regime Legitimation in Cambodia. Journal of East Asian Studies, 22:3.
Wackenhut, A.F. and Orjuela, C., 2023. Engaging the next generation: authoritarian regimes and their young diaspora. European Political Science, 22:1.

SECTION 8
INSTITUTIONS & ACTORS

35 Kyat, Burma (1985), depicting General Ne Win, military dictator.

1 Kyat, Burma (1989), depicting General Aung San, independence leader (and his daughter Aung San Suu Kyi hidden in the watermark).

RULERS & FAMILY

Age & Health of Rulers

When the snake is old, the frog will tease him.
– Persian proverb

Dictators die, and the power they took from the people will return to the people. And so long as men die, liberty will never perish.
– Charlie Chaplin, The Great Dictator (1940)

Declining health and the advanced age of authoritarian leaders have profound implications for political regimes, primarily by increasing uncertainty, influencing economic performance, and altering the dynamics within the ruling elite. These factors do not necessarily lead to political liberalization but create conditions that can foster instability or reform under specific circumstances.

The leader's death (sudden or not) has been a factor in assessing regime transitions for a long time (cf. Betts & Huntington 1985), but declining health has not been a systemic object of study. While incumbents can become incapable for various reasons (e.g., approaching term limits), infirmity and decreasing lucidity are key causes of the 'anatine affliction' ('lame duck' syndrome – cf. Box 3.14). The more power is concentrated in a supreme powerholder, the more increasing uncertainty is dangerous for the regime, although collegial regimes through time have often been run by older men (rarely women), as shown in Box 1.12 on gerontocracy.

As authoritarian leaders age, their increasing mortality risk generates uncertainty within the regime. This uncertainty arises from concerns among government insiders about their future positions and benefits after the leader's death (Tanaka 2017; Falcoff 2017). Will a rival faction influence the course of the regime now that the dictator is becoming incapacitated? Who will decide on distributing rents when the ruler is gone? Will our faction be purged? Will another faction push for a takeover? Is there a successor all factions can stand behind? Is the ruler able to designate a successor? Will the people accept a new leader?

Such instability can destabilize the regime, creating opportunities for challenges from rivals or reformers. However, in many cases, once the dictator is dead, regime elites are incentivized to maintain stability and continuity and, therefore, tend to coalesce around a successor (Kendall-Taylor & Frantz 2016). They often work to ensure a smooth transition to a similar form of government, particularly in regimes with institutionalized succession mechanisms (Hummel 2017; 2020). Thus, the death of a dictator does not systematically lead to political liberalization.

Certain conditions, however, increase the likelihood of reform following a dictator's death. In economically developed countries, there is often a greater latent demand for democracy. Aging dictators in these contexts may implement reforms preemptively to maintain stability or avoid challenges (Hummel 2017; 2020). Moreover, the death of older dictators in such nations can serve as a focal point for pro-democracy movements, potentially leading to successful reform. Additionally, as dictators age, regime outsiders have more time to prepare for post-death contestation. The information advantage held by insiders regarding the leader's health diminishes with age, making older dictators more susceptible to such challenges and increasing the potential for reform (Hummel 2020).

Personalist rule, which lacks institutionalized succession rules, is especially vulnerable to post-death challenges. While elites in these regimes may find ways to address succession issues – sometimes by preemptively removing the dictator – these regimes remain more prone to instability upon the leader's death. Is there evidence that dictators are aware of such inclinations? For instance, (for Imperial China) Wong and Chan (2021) found that elite purges also intensify in an emperor's later years, suggesting a concern for protecting designated successors. Blood relatives of emperors frequently faced milder purges, such as title deprivation (Wong & Chan 2021).

Moreover, older leaders generally exhibit a higher propensity for conflict. Horowitz et al. (2005), drawing on an extensive dataset of interstate dyads from 1875 to 2002, examine the relationship between leader age and the initiation and escalation of militarized disputes. The research delves into potential mechanisms behind these patterns, such as declining testosterone levels and shorter time horizons associated with aging, while also recognizing the limitations of using age as a proxy for these factors. Note that regime type matters and that older leaders in personalist regimes are less likely to initiate conflict (Horowitz et al. 2005) than those in other regime types, even if, overall, they are more bellicose (cf. conflicts).

The advanced age of authoritarian leaders also affects economic performance. Aging dictators often prioritize short-term gains over long-term investments due to their diminishing time horizons (cf. Box 5.5). This shift in priorities can result in slower economic growth and reduced prospects for sustainable development (Jong-A-Pin & Mierau 2022; Papaioannou & Van Zanden 2015).

The relationship between declining leader health and the inner circle further complicates regime dynamics. Autocratic rulers tend to share a range of psychological profiles, some of which can intensify with a declining mental state, especially negative ones like distrustfulness can become amplified. They may become more rigid, inflexible, irritable, and prone to emotional outbursts, making it difficult to work with others and manage complex situations. Also, if they experience a decline in abstract thinking, memory, and concentration, it becomes difficult to process information and make sound judgments (Post & Robins 1993), making them increasingly reliant on trusted aids (cf. 'co-ruling' in female rulers), which in turn can upset the intricate balance of elite factions.

Slow-evolving physical ailments are also taxing for rulers: e.g., prostate cancer (François Mitterand in France and Joseph Mobutu in Zaire), tuberculosis (M.A. Jinnah of Pakistan) or auto-immune diseases (Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines had lupus erythematosus). David Owen (2022) – a British statesman and medical doctor – provides the best comprehensive overview available in In Sickness and in Power: Illness in Heads of Government during the last 100 years.

The inner circle plays a critical role in mediating the leader's decisions and actions, particularly when the leader is partially disabled (Post & Robins 1993). Several factors influence this dynamic, including the leader's awareness of their illness, the nature of the illness, and the political system in place. For instance, a leader who denies their illness may create a 'captive court' overly dependent on a waning despot, leading to political stagnation. Fluctuating disabilities, such as those associated with cerebral degeneration, pose unique challenges as the inner circle may need to shield the leader from decision-making during periods of impairment. This situation can lead to manipulation or factional strife within the ruling elite. Additionally, efforts by the inner circle to conceal the leader's illness – often motivated by self-preservation – can result in harmful delays in treatment and exacerbate governance issues (Post & Robins 1993).

In sum, declining health and advanced age significantly impact authoritarian regimes by fostering uncertainty, shaping economic priorities, and altering elite dynamics. While these factors do not automatically lead to political change or liberalization, they create conditions where instability or reform becomes more likely under certain sets of circumstances. Untangling these exact combinations of circumstances is a work in progress.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Age and Health of Rulers, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Betts, R.K. and Huntington, S.P., 1985. Dead dictators and rioting mobs: does the demise of authoritarian rulers lead to political instability? International Security, 10:3.

Falcoff, M., 2007. When Dictators Die. American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy.

Horowitz, M., McDermott, R. and Stam, A.C., 2005. Leader age, regime type, and violent international relations. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 49:5.

Hummel, S.J., 2017. Leader Age, Death, and Political Reform in Dictatorships.

Hummel, S.J, 2020. Leader age, death, and political liberalization in dictatorships. The Journal of Politics, 82:3.

Jong-A-Pin, R. and Mierau, J.O., 2022. No country for old men: aging dictators and economic growth. Economic Modelling, 107.

Kendall-Taylor, A. and Frantz, E., 2016. When dictators die. Journal of Democracy, 27:4.

Owen, D., 2016. Hubris Syndrome and Hubris trait. Speech to the Royal College of Psychiatrists.

Owen, D., 2022. In Sickness and in Power: Illness in Heads of Government during the last 100 years. Methuen.

Papaioannou, K.J. and Van Zanden, J.L., 2015. The dictator effect: how long years in office affect economic development. Journal of institutional economics, 11:1.

Post, J.M. and Robins, R.S., 1993. The captive king and his captive court: The psychopolitical dynamics of the disabled leader and his inner circle. Family Business Review, 6:2.

Wong, S.H.W. and Chan, K.C.M., 2021. Determinants of political purges in autocracies: Evidence from ancient Chinese dynasties. Journal of Peace Research, 58:3.

Background of Rulers: Education & Competences

EDUCATION, n. That which discloses to the wise and disguises from the foolish their lack of understanding.
– Ambrose Bierce, The Devil's Dictionary (1911)

Where do these dictators come from? Who were they before they took power? The background of dictators – as much as their personal lives – remains fascinating.

While the entry on psychological profiles ponders the question, 'Can anybody become a dictator?' by peering into their soul and psyche, the entry on families offers some insights regarding their relations and collaboration with kin; this entry asks the question, 'Where do they come from?'

Lists of modern autocrats with a synopsis of their biographical information are plentiful: Galván 2013 (Latin America); Besier & Stokłosa 2014; Lee 2016 (Europe). Some paper versions are quite extensive, e.g., East & Thomas (2003) or Coppa (2006). Online versions are limitless and very valuable if curated well, like the Encyclopaedia Britannica. Databases like 'rulers.org' or Archigos (Goemans et al. 2009) are priceless as comprehensive overviews of rulers but leave readers in the dark about where these leaders came from.

Nonetheless, tracking down leaders' origins and personal backgrounds is one thing; answering the question if these are at all related to their behavior in office is another.

Inspired by the works of Francis Galton (1869) and Irving Fisher's Presidential and Other Great American Families (1927) on the background of democratic leaders, Pitirim Sorokin (1925; 1926) investigated rulers' backgrounds for non-democracies: He observes that monarchs often display extremes of exceptional talent and mental deficiency, influenced by both heredity and environment. He attributes their prominence to good hereditary traits but suggests that the pressures of their roles may induce mental and emotional strain. This duality reflects the complex interplay between genetic predisposition and the stresses of leadership.

For example, with the God syndrome of doctors in mind and the fact that ophthalmologist-cum-dictator Bashar al-Assad in Syria was perceived as a blight on the medical community, Ludmir et al. 2017 tested (with a limited sample) and found that actually, a disproportionate number of physicians happened to be brutal dictators; see also Drumhiller & Skvorc (2018) on 'doctator' François Duvalier of Haiti. Are such correlations also causations, or does their experience in office change rulers?

Alexander Baturo's (2016) dataset Cursus Honorum ('career ladder' in Latin) gathers meticulous data on educational attainment, prior political posts and political experience, details about their time in office (and jail), and post-tenure occupations, covering 1501 political leaders in office for the 1960-2010 period, including interim leaders, in all countries (except small island nations). He found that the backgrounds of rulers in party-based, military, and personalist regimes diverge significantly in terms of their education, careers, and family origins, reflecting some (but not all) distinct characteristics of these regime archetypes.

In party-based regimes (single-party regimes), leaders tend to have extensive political experience, often comparable to that of democratic leaders. On average, they spend 12 years in formal political roles and 17 years in politics more broadly, surpassing the political tenure of leaders in military and personalist regimes. These rulers frequently emerge from legislative or party careers and are more likely to have participated in revolutionary movements. Educationally, about one-third of leaders in party regimes lack a university education, a proportion similar to that observed among personalist rulers. Family backgrounds in party-based regimes show a moderate prevalence of middle-class origins (46%) (Baturo 2016).

Leaders in military regimes predominantly come from military or security institutions, with nearly all having undergone military education. They are usually drawn from highly institutionalized military organizations and often hold senior ranks – 70% are generals – distinguishing them from military-affiliated leaders in personalist regimes. Their political experience is notably limited compared to other regime types, averaging only four years in formal politics and six years overall. Military rulers are more likely to come from middle-class families (67%), a higher proportion than those in party-based (46%) or personalist (42%) regimes. This is not insignificant, as shown in the case of Brazilian military leaders from 1964-1985, which illustrates how secure middle-class backgrounds and quality education can shape policy priorities, such as focusing on economic development rather than personal enrichment. (Baturo 2016)

In personalist rule, dictators exhibit some overlap with military leaders but differ in rank and political experience. While they are more likely to have a military background than party-based leaders, they are less likely to be high-ranking officers compared to their counterparts in military regimes. Their political experience is limited, averaging six years in formal roles and nine years overall – shorter than that of party-based leaders but slightly longer than military rulers (Baturo 2016).

Surprisingly, the educational and professional profiles of party rulers and personal dictators differ only slightly. This suggests that personal dictatorships behave distinctively not due to variations in the rulers' characteristics but rather because of the comparatively weaker constraints on their authority relative to other regime types (Baturo 2016: 150-151).

Assessing how rulers' professional and educational backgrounds influence their outlook, behavior, and the trajectories of their regimes remains a challenging task due to the interplay of multiple factors. These difficulties arise from the complexity of causality, the heterogeneity of contexts, data limitations, institutional mediation, dynamic interactions between leaders and regimes, and the multidimensional nature of outcomes.

For instance, while education might shape a leader's worldview or policy preferences, decisions are often dictated by pragmatic considerations or external pressures like economic crises or international dynamics. Also, the significance of education or professional experience varies across periods, cultures, and political systems. In technocratic regimes, technical expertise might play a central role in governance, whereas in hereditary monarchies or traditional societies, familial norms and cultural expectations may overshadow formal education.

Data limitations and selection bias also pose significant obstacles. Historical records often emphasize rulers' achievements or failures rather than systematically documenting their educational or professional trajectories. For modern leaders, media portrayals and historiographical biases distort narratives.

Institutional mediation adds another layer of complexity. Leaders do not govern in isolation; their decisions are shaped by the institutions they lead and create and the advisers they select and choose to rely on. Their level of micro-management or delegation also plays a big role.

Also, where does the impact of background end and the impact of their psychological profiles start? How to untangle these? Education might influence certain aspects of governance – such as technocratic policy preferences – but not others, like interpersonal leadership style. Even autocratic models of management (in sociology) can, at times, yield benefits, as shown by De Hoogh et al. (2015), since they can positively affect morale and performance through the creation of a psychologically appealing, hierarchically-ordered environment of predictability and security for the team.

Finally, leadership outcomes are multidimensional and dynamic. Rulers are not only shaped by their regimes but also adapt to them over time. Still, the full package of education, skills, psychology, etc., that makes up a ruler's governance style seems to matter and constrains how they are able to transform political systems (although this remains intertwined with systemic factors).

Recent studies took a closer look at populist rulers and found that only a minority transition into repressive personalist dictators, particularly in liberal democracies. While their charismatic appeal and reliance on plebiscitary support enable them to maintain legitimacy and control without large-scale repression, violence would undermine their crafted image of representing 'the people.' Additionally, populists face challenges in securing reliable military backing, as empowering the latter risks creating a rival and threatening their autonomy. While cases like Alberto Fujimori in Peru illustrate that extreme crises can bridge this gap, the inherent tensions between populist agendas and military interests generally act as a barrier to full-scale autocracy (Weyland 2024; Baturo et al. 2024).

On the other hand, François et al. (2019; 2020) found that the perception of a ruler's background affects the choices of investors when assessing the risk of investing or not. There is strong evidence that educated dictators and those with prior business experience attract more FDI. Somewhat unexpectedly, their age or prior political experience does not affect such decisions.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Background of Rulers: Education and Competences, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Baturo, A., 2016. Cursus honorum: Personal background, careers and experience of political leaders in democracy and dictatorship – New data and analyses. Politics and Governance, 4:2.

Baturo, A., Kenny, P.D. and Balta, E., 2024. Leaders' experience and the transition from populism to dictatorship. Democratization.

Besier, G. and Stokłosa, K., 2014. European Dictatorships: A comparative history of the twentieth century. Cambridge Scholars Publishing.

Coppa, F.J., ed., 2006. Encyclopedia of modern dictators: from Napoleon to the present. Peter Lang.

De Hoogh, A.H., Greer, L.L. and Den Hartog, D.N., 2015. Diabolical dictators or capable commanders? An investigation of the differential effects of autocratic leadership on team performance. The Leadership Quarterly, 26:5.

Drumhiller, N.K. and Skvorc, C., 2018. A Psychological and Political Analysis of a 20th Century "Doctator:" Dr. François Duvalier, President-for-Life of Haiti. Global Security & Intelligence Studies, 3:1.

East, R. and Thomas, R.J., 2003. Profiles of People in Power: The World's Government Leaders. Routledge.

Fisher, I., 1927. Presidential and Other Great American Families. The Sphinx Publishing Co.

François, A., Panel, S. and Weill, L., 2019. Are some dictators more attractive to foreign investors? BOFIT Discussion Papers.

Francois, A., Panel, S. and Weill, L., 2020. Educated dictators attract more foreign direct investment. Journal of Comparative Economics, 48:1.

Galton, F., 1869. Hereditary genius: An inquiry into its laws and consequences. Macmillan and Co.

Galván, J.A., 2013. Latin American dictators of the 20th century: The lives and regimes of 15 rulers. McFarland.

Goemans, H.E., Gleditsch, K.S. and Chiozza, G., 2009. Introducing Archigos: A dataset of political leaders. Journal of Peace Research, 46:2.

Lee, S.J., 2016. European Dictatorships 1918-1945. Routledge.

Ludmir, E.B., Elahi, M.A. and Richman, B.D., 2017. The physician as dictator. The Lancet, 390:10099.

Sorokin, P., 1925. Monarchs and rulers: A comparative statistical study. Social Forces, 4:1.

Sorokin, P., 1926. Monarchs and rulers: A comparative statistical study. Social Forces, 4:3.

Weyland, K., 2024. Why Populist Authoritarians Rarely Turn into Repressive Dictators. Comparative Politics.

Families of Rulers

Even the blind favor the people they know.
– Indian proverb

The integration of family members into political regimes, whether in pre-modern monarchies or modern authoritarian systems, reveals a fascinating interplay between familial relationships and political power. Of course, few family constellations are similar; none are identical. The times when a ruling family is propelled into power differ. Do most of the childhood memories of their offspring relate to pre-revolutionary times, or did they grow up in the heart of the regime? Are they allowed in the inner circle or hidden away? Is their mother a regime insider, or has the ruler abandoned the family seeking greatness?

The need for family is deeply human and allows for connection with protagonists and triggers comparisons. Glimpses into the life of dictator's children (Nordlinger 2017) or anecdotal evidence of their intimate relations (Cawthorne 1996), their relation with pets (Box 8.1) might be fascinating for readers to gauge a ruler's level of 'humanity' – but most often this is not political science. In combination with the laundry list of psychological, social, cultural and structural variables that require accounting for, a comparative analysis with solid insights so far remains elusive, and any methodology behind it is wide open to criticism. A preferred and common framework to analyze family-based networks is clan politics, although the study of political dynasties is also emerging.

Notwithstanding these diverse dynamics across historical and cultural contexts, a survey of kinship patterns in pre-modern and contemporary times yields some descriptive insights when framed through the lens of comparative politics (deeper anthropological, historical, biological or socioeconomic frames are beyond this entry).

Mothers, Aunts, Uncles, Siblings & In-laws in pre-modern monarchies, the involvement of mothers, aunts, uncles, and siblings in governance was both a source of strength and a potential vulnerability. Queen mothers often played pivotal roles as regents or kingmakers, particularly during periods of royal minorities (underage rulers) or succession crises (cf. female rulers). For instance, matrilineal societies sometimes empowered female figures to act as intermediaries between generations, ensuring dynastic continuity while limiting the arbitrary power of monarchs (Duindam 2021). These women could act as stabilizing forces, bridging gaps during transfers of supreme power.

Rulers with several daughters might choose not to keep them at home, like Charlemagne, but to send them out to foreign courts. Also, siblings and cousins (sometimes widowed aunts) were actively incorporated in monarchic marriage policies. They secured alliances, expanded the family Patrimonium (through inheritance by their offspring), acted as diplomats, promoted and supported religious institutions, attracted investments from the political center, and could wield considerable influence despite dual loyalties. (Bartlett 2020).

While women were often given little say in whom they married – though widows tended to have more autonomy – it would be a mistake to assume that royal women always served merely as pawns in forging alliances, whether foreign or domestic. While many women may have played such roles (though the limited availability of sources might skew our understanding), others were far more influential. Women frequently acted as diplomats, sustaining and sometimes reshaping the alliances their marriages were meant to secure. Consanguineous marriages, such as those between close relatives, strengthened family ties and curbed the emergence of rival branches within royal families (Carney & Müller 2021; Akkerman & Houben 2014).

However, the ambitions of royal siblings or extended family members could also destabilize regimes. Agnatic relatives – brothers or cousins – were frequently appointed as viceroys or generals due to their dynastic charisma but were simultaneously viewed as threats capable of spearheading rebellions (Kumarasingham 2020; Duindam 2021). Monarchs often resorted to surveillance, exile, or even execution to neutralize such threats once succession neared. Harem politics (in Box 5.11) provide Ottoman examples.

In modern authoritarian regimes, family members (even in-laws) similarly occupy key positions within the ruling apparatus but with a greater emphasis on consolidating personalist rule. According to Baturo (2016), 8% of leaders in dictatorships are relatives of their predecessors, a phenomenon predominantly observed in monarchies of course. Dynasties also emerge in democracies. Dictators also rely on family members and close friends as trusted allies, appointing them to significant positions of power (Rubin 1987).

The first reason is coup-proofing. Dictators like Saddam Hussein in Iraq and Hafez al-Assad in Syria strategically placed siblings and other close relatives in high-ranking roles within the military or government to secure loyalty and control over critical resources (Rubin 1987). Under the Somozas in Nicaragua, the president's half-brother was also in charge of the presidential guard. This practice reduced the risk of betrayal by outsiders while reinforcing the regime's inner circle.

A second reason for hiring relatives (besides trust) is for critical information-gathering and for actually (and truthfully) representing the regime abroad. Under personalist rule, why would foreign elites engage with sycophantic ambassadors who have neither power nor influence? (who are expected to report back to the capital in a subjective or embellished fashion out of fear of losing their position). Therefore, key positions are often trusted to family, who are not afraid of getting fired and can speak their mind to the ruler (in private, at least). For instance, Imelda Marcos' brother served as the Philippine ambassador to Washington, the Shah of Iran appointed his son-in-law as his main ambassador for this position, and a relative of the Somoza family held the same role for Nicaragua (Rubin 1987).

Of course, not all ambassador positions are that relevant, and sometimes, family members are sent far away to keep them out of trouble or away from power. Kim Pyong-Il, a half-brother of Kim Jong-Il, served as ambassador to several European countries, including Hungary, Poland, and the Czech Republic. This appointment kept him in a peripheral position, minimizing threats to Kim's family rule while leveraging his presence for diplomatic purposes.

Note that children (not only sons) can be trusted to represent the regime faithfully and provide a direct line to the ruler: Isabel dos Santos in Angola, the daughter of José Eduardo, while not an ambassador, played a significant role in Angola's international business dealings, serving as an informal envoy to key allies. At one point, she was considered one of the wealthiest women in the world. Mussolini's daughter Edda acted as a trusted (informal) go-between with the Nazi leadership (Nordlinger 2017).

The third reason is hoarding and expanding the family fortune by allowing relatives to head lucrative business sectors, a practice theorized in prebendalism and nepotism (Box 1.1).

However, familial rivalries may still emerge, as seen in many personalist dictatorships where power struggles among relatives occasionally lead to purges or internal instability.

For example, there was significant tension between Jean-Claude 'Baby Doc' Duvalier and his uncle Luckner Cambronne (1929-2006) under Duvalier family rule in Haiti. Cambronne served as a high-ranking official under 'Papa Doc' and became infamous for his role as the head of the feared Tonton Macoutes, the Duvalier regime's brutal paramilitary. He was nicknamed the 'Vampire of the Caribbean' for allegedly profiting from the sale of Haitian blood and corpses to foreign medical institutions, a practice that earned him international notoriety (Independent 2006). After Baby Doc inherited power in 1971 at just 19 years old, Cambronne sought to maintain his influence over the young ruler, effectively acting as a power behind the throne. However, Baby Doc and his clique gradually grew wary of Cambronne's dominance and forced Cambronne into exile in Miami in 1972.

Nursultan Nazarbayev, Kazakhstan's former president, broke with his son-in-law, Rakhat Aliyev (1961-2015) (married to his eldest daughter Dariga). Aliyev initially held influential roles (successively as chief of the tax police, deputy chief of the security services, ambassador to Austria, and deputy foreign minister) but alarmed Nazarbayev with his growing ambition and ruthlessness. The rupture became irreparable when Aliyev was implicated in the abduction and murder of two bank executives (among other murders and accusations of torture), a scandal that damaged his reputation and directly challenged Nazarbayev's authority. In Kazakhstan's centralized authoritarian system, such disloyalty from a family member posed a significant threat. Nazarbayev responded by stripping Aliyev of his positions, exiling him, and facilitating prosecution abroad while enforcing an end to the marriage with his daughter. In 2015, Aliyev committed suicide in an Austrian prison, awaiting trial (under suspicious circumstances) (Zalmayev 2015).

Children The preparation of children for political roles has been a hallmark of both monarchies and authoritarian regimes. In pre-modern monarchies, children were groomed from an early age for their future responsibilities. Royal education emphasized virtues such as piety, justice, and loyalty while providing training in governance and diplomacy. For example, in medieval Europe, princely education often included lessons on law and statecraft alongside religious instruction (Woodacre et al. 2019).

Notably, the specula principum (mirrors for princes) played a critical role in royal education during the Latin Middle Ages by serving as instructional texts aimed at shaping rulers' conduct and virtues. (For autocrats, The Prince by Machiavelli is the most famous example, alongside Kautilya's Arthashastra – cf. Box 2.2.). These works provided moral and practical guidance, combining classical, scriptural, and ecclesiastical influences to define ideal princely behavior with colorful examples. By embedding subtle criticism or outright admonitions, they also sought to foster self-reflection and promote governance aligned with justice and societal welfare (Nederman 1998).

Another example would be the Siete Partidas ('Seven Parts') of Alfonso X of Castile, a comprehensive legal code created during his reign (1252-1284) with the aim of unifying the laws and customs of his kingdoms and providing a legal framework for newly conquered territories. Its seven parts contain over 2500 laws, drew heavily on Justinian's Corpus Juris civilis and incorporated biblical and philosophical writings, particularly those of Aristotle. The code was part of Alfonso X's broader vision to centralize monarchy (despite objections of the nobility) (Woodacre et al. 2019).

The Siete Partidas also presented Alfonso X's take on rulership, particularly in its emphasis on the education of royal children. The code outlined an educational program designed to instill values and skills necessary for rulership in both male and female offspring. It stressed the importance of maintaining peace, upholding justice, and defending the kingdom as core responsibilities of future rulers. Boys were prepared as kings through formal education, while girls were educated primarily by their mothers and female attendants to fulfill their roles as queens. The program emphasized engaging children in learning and enabling them to absorb rules and teachings effectively. This educational focus reflected Alfonso's broader efforts to create a well-ordered kingdom where royal authority extended not only through governance but also through the preparation of future monarchs (Woodacre et al. 2019).

More than siblings or rulers, royal children were used as pawns in dynastic strategies; their marriages secured alliances and expanded territories (Duindam 2021). The public nature of their lives underscored their symbolic importance to the continuity of the dynasty.

Dictators and non-royal usurpers also try to integrate themselves into prestigious networks through the marriages of their children. Franco and Mussolini's daughters married into nobility (Nordlinger 2017) and kept their aristocratic titles and status even after their fathers' dictatorships fell. Their children's marriage linked the founding presidential families of Kazakhstan and Kyrgyzstan. Kyrgyz President Askar Akayev's son, Aidar, married Aliya Nazarbayeva, the youngest daughter of the president of Kazakhstan. The marriage symbolized a strategic alliance between two powerful families in Central Asia, reflecting the intertwining of personal and political. The marriage did not outlive the Tulip Revolution and the ouster and exile of Akayev, which was followed by embarrassing corruption inquiries of all involved family members.

In modern authoritarian regimes, (male) children are similarly prepared for leadership roles but within a more centralized and often militarized framework. Dynastic dictatorships like North Korea's Kim dynasty exemplify this trend. Successors are groomed through formal education and exposure to statecraft while being introduced to propaganda mechanisms that glorify their lineage (Baturo 2016). This preparation ensures that they embody the regime's ideals while consolidating the family's hold on power. However, such grooming can also lead to internal tensions if multiple heirs vie for influence or if external pressures challenge the legitimacy of dynastic succession.

In dictatorships, depending on their age and experience, children can take up their father's previous position before the latter became head of state: Sara Duterte served as mayor of Davao City from 2010 to 2013 and again from 2016 to 2022, succeeding her father, Rodrigo Duterte in that position and upholding his patronage networks. Bound by term limits, her father (ruled: 2016-2022) stepped down and retired, officially at least. Sara ran as vice president in 2022 and linked forces with presidential candidate Marcos Jr. (see also below). They succeeded in getting elected, but tensions in the regime were mounting between both dynastic networks.

Still, children affiliated with the inner circle at a formative young age may find themselves at the nexus of an international network. Depending on their relationship with their parents, this socialization and natural advantages (knowledge, experience, contacts) usually benefit them in later life, both in politics and business. This seems to be the same for democracies (Folke et al. 2017). Many children of autocrats embark on a career in politics, drawing from the charisma of their parents or (grandparents).

Strangely, the 'Mogadishu line' (Box 3.12) of their parents' action – the national and international condemnation that comes from state terror – does not seem to affect them once enough time passes. Marcos' son, Ferdinand 'Bongbong' Marcos Jr., was elected president of the Philippines in May 2022, despite his father's brutal legacy. Alessandra Mussolini (she especially retained the name), the granddaughter of Benito Mussolini, served as a member of the European Parliament (MEP). She was elected as an MEP in 2004 and later re-elected in 2009.

Of course, children can be unruly. Gulnara Karimova, the eldest daughter of Uzbek dictator Islam Karimov, exemplifies how autocrats use family connections to amass wealth and consolidate power. Initially a glamorous public figure with roles in diplomacy, business, and entertainment, Karimova leveraged her father's position to build an empire of corruption. She extorted massive bribes from multinational corporations, particularly in Uzbekistan's lucrative telecommunications sector, funneling billions of dollars into offshore accounts. As a prominent figure in Uzbekistan, Karimova used her influence to silence critics, blackmail competitors, and expand her family's wealth through exploitative practices. Her opulent lifestyle – marked by designer brands, a pop music career under the name 'Googoosha,' and a global socialite image – stood in stark contrast to the poverty and repression faced by ordinary Uzbeks. Her unchecked ambitions, however, made her a liability. Clashing with other inner circle members, including her own family, she was placed under house arrest in 2014 and later imprisoned by the new Uzbek regime following her father's death. She acquired special perks in prison, too, cf. Najibullah 2024. Her dramatic downfall exposed the inner workings of an authoritarian regime where relatives are deployed as tools to enrich the ruling family, often at the cost of public trust. Gulnara's story highlights the corrosive impact of rogue nepotism (Box 1.1) and unchecked power in personalist regimes.

Close friends both pre-modern monarchies and modern authoritarian regimes have relied on non-family members who functioned as quasi-family due to their proximity to power. In monarchies, courtiers and trusted advisers often became indispensable allies to royal families. Their presence at court allowed them to secure positions for themselves or their clients while maintaining influence over royal decisions (Friedeburg & Morrill 2017). Such individuals acted as intermediaries between the monarchy and broader society, facilitating governance while reinforcing the ruler's authority. Due to traditional hierarchies, it was not always possible for non-aristocratic buddies to make such positions permanent and hereditary.

In authoritarian regimes, this dynamic is mirrored by the inclusion of friends, classmates, army buddies, and loyalists who, over time, are treated as extensions of the ruler's family. In Iran, the Shah entrusted his chauffeur with commanding the army (Rubin 1987). In Turkmenistan, the dentist of Saparmurat Niyazov became minister of health (and later president).

These individuals often occupy critical roles within the regime's security apparatus or economic institutions. For example, Saddam Hussein appointed non-relatives from his hometown or tribal network into key positions to create a sense of familial loyalty (Rubin 1987) (cf. 'ethnic stacking' in coup-proofing). However, these relationships may become sources of vulnerability if such trusted allies turn against the ruler or defect (if caught, such betrayals are usually fatally punished).

The integration of family members or those treated like family into political regimes highlights a continuity in how kinship ties are leveraged for governance across different historical periods. If networks extend over generations, dynasties are naturally formed, and these can be durable. Usually, the lifespan of contemporary dictatorships does not extend for more than two generations, although children and grandchildren of (in)famous rulers tend to get into politics (and sometimes succeed).

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Families of Rulers, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Akkerman, N. and Houben, B., eds., 2014. The Politics of Female Households: Ladies in-Waiting across Early Modern Europe. Brill.

Bartlett, R., 2020. Blood Royal: Dynastic Politics in Medieval Europe. Cambridge University Press.

Baturo, A., 2016. Cursus honorum: Personal background, careers and experience of political leaders in democracy and dictatorship – New data and analyses. Politics and Governance, 4:2.

Box 8.1 Pets & Rulers: Feline Fascination & Other Animal Companions

Casa con un gatto, casa con un cuore (Happy is the home with at least one cat)
– Italian proverb

Queen Elizabeth II and Catherine the Great loved their purebreds (Welsh Corgis and Italian greyhounds, respectively). Alexander the Great's war horse, 'Bucephalus,' and Caligula's 'Incantatus' went down in history. Hitler's affection for 'Blondi' (a German shepherd) is well documented and caught on film. Blondi accompanied Hitler until the very end of his life – she was poisoned by Hitler himself just before his suicide in 1945.

Many rulers are known for their affection toward dogs: Henry VIII – mastiffs, Napoleon – a pug; Kim Il-Sung – poodles; or horses like Gurbanguly Berdymukhamedov of Turkmenistan; or fish: General Yamashita (Japan) – koi fish.

Some preferred to show off by keeping exotic animals: Louis XIV – tropical birds; Haile Selassie (Ethiopia) and Saddam Hussein (Iraq) – lions; Qaddafi (Libya) – camels and ostriches; Idi Amin (Uganda) – crocodiles (he even fed them the body parts of his victims).

Still, very few have developed notable bonds with cats, creatures considered independently-minded and aloof. Cleopatra was said to be fond of cats, but these animals had a special status in ancient Egypt.

Cats seem like an unusual choice for authoritarian leaders who often demand loyalty and control. However, some dictators found companionship in these enigmatic creatures, perhaps drawn to their mysterious qualities or simply seeking solace in their presence. For some reason, Soviet rulers really seem outliers when it comes to cats:

Lenin, as a hunter, had an arrangement of dogs (but also some cats), with whom he spent more time as he became infirm. Pets could serve symbolic purposes for dictatorships. For example, for propaganda purposes, Lenin's image as 'Grandpa Lenin' was bolstered by photos showing him holding a cat (allegedly called 'Vasily') – an attempt to portray him as amiable and kindly despite his revolutionary fervor.

Stalin's bond with his rescue dog 'Yashka' (named after Yakov Sverdlov, a fellow revolutionary) during his exile in Siberia is well-documented, and many animals were gifted to him throughout his life. He ended up with his colony of squirrels at his dacha – the offspring of one gifted by Khrushchev after WWII – and even a bear. However, there is no significant record of Stalin being particularly fond of cats. Recurrent anecdotes mention Stalin and a cat called 'Pushkin,' a Siberian cat. According to some sources, Stalin reportedly kept Pushkin as a companion in his later years. The cat is said to have been one of the few beings that could approach him without fear. As with Lenin, Stalin's fondness for dogs helped humanize him in propaganda efforts aimed at softening his brutal image.

Nikita Khrushchev, on the other hand, was very much a dog person. As was Fidel Castro (although he was also very fond of a cow named 'Ubre Blanca'), and it was Castro who once gifted two chihuahua puppies to the Soviet leader, sparking a trend for this dog breed in the USSR. Khrushchev also received an English poodle from Queen Elizabeth II during an official visit to Britain – a gift that further solidified his reputation as a dog lover.

An undisputed example of a cat-loving Soviet leader was Leonid Brezhnev, who was gifted a black cat named 'Lama' by the Dalai Lama during an official visit to India in 1969. This cat became somewhat legendary due to a prophecy that accompanied it: if Lama ever behaved strangely, it was believed that Brezhnev was in danger. According to various accounts, Lama 'saved' Brezhnev's life on multiple occasions by exhibiting odd behavior before assassination attempts or accidents. Allegedly, the cat's actions led Brezhnev to alter his plans, thus avoiding potential harm.

Another Soviet leader known for his fondness for cats was Mikhail Gorbachev, the last leader of the Soviet Union. In his later years, Gorbachev had a favorite cat named 'Willy' (perhaps named after Willy Brandt, Chancellor of West Germany?) whom he frequently was seen stroking during public appearances (the cat, not the chancellor). Willy the cat even became immortalized in a painting by artist Nikolai Sednin, symbolizing Gorbachev's softer side amidst his role as a global political figure overseeing the dissolution of the Soviet Union.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Pets and Rulers: Feline Fascination and Other Animal Companions, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Farley, R., 2016. The List You Never Knew You Needed: Vile Men & Their Fuzzy Pets. Refinery29.

Henninger-Voss, M., 2002. Animals in Human Histories: The Mirror of Nature and Culture. University of Rochester Press.

Merullo, R., 2008. Fidel's Last Days. Vintage Books.

Overy, R., 2004. The Dictators: Hitler's Germany, Stalin's Russia. Allen Lane.

Russia Beyond, 2024. What pets did Soviet leaders have?

The Times of India, 2002. This Lama saved Soviet leader's life twice.

Sebag Montefiore, S., 2003. Stalin: The Court of the Red Tsar. Weidenfeld & Nicolson.

York, P., 2006. Dictator Style: Lifestyles of the World's Most Colorful Despots. Chronicle Books.

Carney, E.D. and Müller, S., eds., 2021. The Routledge companion to women and monarchy in the ancient Mediterranean world. Routledge.
Cawthorne, N., 1996. Sex lives of the great dictators: an irreverent exposé of despots, tyrants and other monsters. Sex Lives Series.
Davison, P., 2006. Luckner Cambronne; The Vampire of the Caribbean. The Independent, 6.
Duindam, J., 2021. Gender, succession and dynastic rule. History and Anthropology, 32:2.
Folke, O., Persson, T. and Rickne, J., 2017. Dynastic political rents? Economic benefits to relatives of top politicians. The Economic Journal, 127:605.
Kumarasingham, H., ed., 2020. Viceregalism: The Crown as Head of State in Political Crises in the Postwar Commonwealth. Springer Nature.
Najibullah, F., 2024. Gulnara Karimova Enjoying 'Special Treatment' In Uzbek Prison, Former Inmate Says. Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty.
Nederman, C.J., 1998. The mirror crack'd: The speculum principum as political and social criticism in the late Middle Ages. The European Legacy, 3:3.
Nordlinger, J., 2017. Children of Monsters: An Inquiry into the Sons and Daughters of Dictators. Encounter Books.
Rubin, B., 1988. Modern dictators. Plume Books.
Von Friedeburg, R. and Morrill, J. eds., 2017. Monarchy transformed: Princes and their elites in early modern Western Europe. Cambridge University Press.
Woodacre, E., Dean, L.H., Jones, C., Martin, R. and Rohr, Z.E., eds., 2019. The Routledge history of monarchy. Routledge.
Zalmayev, P., 2015. Bitter end for Kazakhstan's sugar czar. Al Jazeera.

Female Rulers & Powerful Women in Regimes

牝雞無晨 (Pìn jī wú chén)
(Hens should not announce the dawn)
– Shangshu 尚書 – Book of documents

Bees are governed and doe live under a Monarchy (…) admitting and receiving their King (…) by respective advise, considerate judgement, and a prudent election; (…) and their King being deeply bound to them by an oath, they exceedingly honor and love.
– Edward Topsell, Historie of Serpents. Or, The Second Booke of Living Creatures (1608)

Although not published until 1608, Edward Topsell's book quoted above compares bee hives with political systems and persists – despite some available evidence on the contrary – that male bees rule hives, i.e., 'bee monarchs.' His book is largely a translation of an unpublished manuscript originally written in 1565 by Konrad von Gesner and later revised by several subsequent writers. Gesner (and others like him) drew heavily on the perspectives of ancient authorities, particularly Aristotle, regarding both the behavior of bees and the use of a bee colony as a metaphor for an ideal, orderly state. Prevalent were such political perspectives based on mistaken notions that a king rules a hive and that its inhabitants are noble, warlike male soldiers (Prete 1991: 119-120)

'Queen bees are impossible and unnatural.' This exact thinking, arguably, was the main reason why so few women occupied thrones as real powerholders. Even just the observation that female rulers have been so rare has deeply permeated our understanding of history that we project this documented gender imbalance even onto prehistorical times.

The depth of this 'permanence bias' never ceases to amaze: Spanish archaeologists reported on a tomb uncovered in 2014 at a site known as La Almoloya, where they found a silver diadem on top of the skull of a Bronze Age woman buried within palace-like ruins, a once-elaborate structure dominating a rocky hilltop overlooking the plains. The site was once part of the El Argar society, which thrived and controlled territories along the southeastern Iberian Peninsula from about 2200 to 1550 BCE (Price 2021). This could only mean one thing: "A richly adorned female ruler buried in a Bronze Age palace suggests women could also occupy the throne. There's no way to know the true extent of her power, researchers note, but the find could lead others to reconsider their assumptions about the status of women throughout prehistory." (Price 2021).

This entry explores the historical narrative of female rulers, highlighting the evolution of scholarly attention to this subject. Until recently, academic studies largely focused on individual case studies within specific dynasties or world regions. It is only in the past two decades that more comprehensive and comparative analyses have emerged. Despite this ongoing process, there remains a significant emphasis on female monarchs (not contemporary cases), primarily studied through traditional principles of succession, marriage and inheritance.

Weber's concept of traditional rule was foremost male-centered in the West and most of the rest of the world but was not immutable. While surviving primary evidence from Sub Saharan Africa and the Indo-Pacific region is sparse in comparison to Eurasia, area specialists have irrevocably challenged the Western-centric bias associated with male primogeniture (Box 5.10). This analytical perspective had been the benchmark for non-Western contexts before and during colonial times. Africa and Southeast Asia boast long legacies of female rule, yet the scarcity of primary sources has hindered a balanced scholarly understanding of this phenomenon, as well as a recalibration of popular understanding about gender norms of rulers.

In contrast, 'Eurasian' female rulers like Cleopatra VII Thea Philopater (reign: 69-30 BCE) in Egypt and several 'Greats' like Tamar (Kingdom of Georgia), Margaret I (Denmark, Norway & Sweden), Catherine II (tsarist Russia); Elisabeth I of England & Ireland, are remembered and widely recognized as strong female rulers. Slowly, royal women of earlier times, like several Byzantine queens, Irene of Athens (reign: 797-802 CE) and the (co-)rule of the sisters Zoe (reign: 1042) and Theodora Porphyrogenita (reign: 1042; 1055-1056), or Melisende of Jerusalem (reign: 1131-1152) during the crusades; have gradually trickled in collective consciousness (Carney & Müller 2021).

Another bias in historical narratives is the male dominance in public politics, while the private sphere – where women often played significant roles – is considered less political. Recent studies, spearheaded by those on harem systems (Box 5.11), have contested these views by attributing substantial political influence to women beyond the role of female monarchs, including mothers of rulers, concubines, wives, and sometimes sisters (cf. Akkerman & Houben 2014).

However, when it comes to charismatic rule, women have been largely overlooked. This oversight partly stems from Weber's delineation of charisma (which he appropriated) and has historically been biased in favor of male characteristics. Consequently, theoretical frameworks have often favored male examples. (Hyde 1989; Devarachetty 2012; Turai 2017; 2020; Joosse 2014; Joosse & Willey 2020) Some scholars have begun to challenge this gender bias by advocating for greater inclusivity and presenting female charismatic leaders from religious spheres as examples (Turai 2017;020; Joosse & Willey 2020).

The first section of this entry is titled 'Queens, Regents & Dowagers,' focusing on their patterns of rule, ascension to power, and the challenges they faced. The subsequent section examines 'Female Presidents, Prime Ministers & Dictators,' emphasizing Weber's third source of legitimacy: legal-rational rulership manifested through elections. This section builds on T. Skard's (2022) seminal work that maps how, since 1960, women harnessed charisma during election campaigns, inherited it from charismatic predecessors, or emerged from relative obscurity after a lifetime of public service during acute crises or prolonged conflicts. Not all these contemporary leaders were democratic or remained democrats during their tenure. In contrast to male dictators, there is no pattern wherein female rulers regularly gained power through military means.

The third part briefly explores the concept of 'Co-rulers: Wives and Partners' – often referred to as the better (or worse) halves of male dictators, as prominent partners of dictators are often demonized if they are politically influential like Imelda Romuáldez Marcos (wife of Ferdinand Marcos of the Philippines) or Jiang Qing ('Madame Mao' Zedong's fourth wife). With the 2024 ouster and exile of Bashar al-Assad in Syria, his wife, Asma al-Assad, has also been scrutinized by the media.

This section connects with the limited literature on this subject and previous understandings of 'inner court' or 'palace politics' – see also Box 5.11 on harems – where women's roles apart from the supreme leadership have been underrepresented. This entry blends with the entry on the family of the ruler and other political forces behind the throne.

Queens, Regents & Dowagers The historical scarcity of female rulers can be attributed to several factors. One significant factor is the pervasive gender bias that historically excluded women from warfare, a sphere closely intertwined with monarchy: "Granted that so many monarchs were also war leaders, at least symbolically, the fact that women were generally excluded from direct participation in warfare is certainly an important reason why they rarely ruled." (Carney & Müller 2021: 6). This exclusion extended to societal expectations and inheritance practices, making it significantly less likely for women to inherit thrones or wield power. Patriarchal structures and cultural norms further reinforced male dominance in leadership roles, often framing female rule as an anomaly or a threat to the established order.

However, Heari (2020) nuances this: So long as dynastic rivalries were restricted to the ruling dynasty (the political sphere only), the people (including religious leaders) were not in a position to object. Religious institutions and personnel, though commanding popular authority, were still dependent on the sponsorship of the sultan or the caliph and thus not particularly keen to intervene. This resonates with patrimonialism and absolutism where monarchs could designate female kin above the 'laws of men.'

Women who did ascend to positions of power faced a significant legitimacy deficit, constantly needing to prove their capabilities and combat societal expectations. They encountered challenges to their authority from male-dominated governing elites and often faced opposition and even attempts to depose them.

"Consensual attitudes have been ascribed to women rulers in South East Asia (...). Elsewhere, too, queens on the throne have been described as eager to placate elites and please their peoples. Again, it is difficult to accept such generalizations: the annals of dynastic power include ferocious women as well as gentlemen. (...) While the numbers of women queens like Nzinga who actually led their troops into battle may be limited, we have numerous examples of women as astute political operators and war leaders. (...) It makes no sense to ascribe pacific attitudes and a disposition for consensual decision making to all women on the throne or to assume that all men tended to be violent and irresponsible. More than men, women were confronted with a legitimacy deficit: the assumption of a mismatch between women and supreme power complicated the acceptance of women rule by elites and the populace. This predicament could lead queens to either prove their equivalence to males by conspicuously exerting power and using violence, or, conversely, by showing eagerness to placate elites and please their peoples." (Duindam 2021: 165).

Opportunities for female rule often arose in specific circumstances, such as the absence of male heirs or during times of crisis. Even when they inherited thrones, women rulers frequently needed the support of male figures, whether as husbands, regents, or advisers, to solidify their authority and navigate the complexities of governance. While formal rules of inheritance sometimes explicitly allowed female succession, this did not necessarily translate into widespread acceptance or frequent occurrences of female rule (Monter 2012; Carney & Müller 2021).

Regency served as a pathway for women to gain political experience and influence. Queen mothers often wielded considerable power, particularly when acting as regents for their young sons. Motherhood did not necessarily diminish the power of these queens, but it distinguished their roles from the male-defined aspects of sovereignty, thus not directly challenging gendered perceptions. Dowagers were often admired for being pious, virtuous, loving, and merciful educators. In imperial China, many women wielded de facto power as dowager empresses. Similarly, France and the Ottoman Empire, both known for their explicit rejection of female rule, readily accepted queen mothers who were notably influential during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (Duindam 2021). However, their authority was often viewed as temporary and derived from their role as mothers rather than as independent rulers (Bartlet 2020).

Regional variations existed, with some areas like Austronesia and Africa showing a more pronounced presence of female rulers than others. The sources highlight a cluster of female rule in East Asia during the sixteenth century, with women leaders appearing in Japan and Korea (Duindam 2021). In contrast, in medieval Latin Christendom, the legal exclusion of women from inheriting the French throne (Pactus Legis Salicæ or the Salic law) played a significant role in limiting female rule by justifying absolute male primogeniture (Box 5.10).

Female rulers historically came to power through a variety of pathways shaped by cultural norms, inheritance practices, and political circumstances. The most common route was inheritance, particularly when a king had no surviving sons. In such cases, daughters could inherit the throne as legitimate heirs, reflecting the importance of dynastic continuity over gendered expectations of rulership.

However, even in systems that allowed for female inheritance, hereditary charisma, in Weber's understanding, was not easily transferred and women successors often faced significant obstacles. Queen Elizabeth I (reign: 1558-1603) of England and Ireland, the last of the Tudors, refusing to get married, skillfully asserted her authority despite facing persistent doubts based on her gender, the open rejection of her royal claim (by Pope Pius V) and several conspiracies to unseat her.

Claims were frequently contested by male relatives, leading to disputes, civil wars, and power struggles. For example, Isabel I of Castile (reign: 1474-1504) had to fight a civil war against her niece to secure her position. Marriage also played a critical role in shaping the authority of female rulers. Cleopatra VII of Egypt used her lineage, a marriage alliance and political acumen to secure power after she was exiled by her brother Ptolemy XIII; in her military takeover with a Roman alliance, she ended up killing her younger brother (who drowned while fleeing) (Monter 2012).

Regency offered another pathway to power for women, particularly as mothers of underage kings or wives of absent rulers. These roles were often temporary but allowed women to exercise authority, gain experience in governance, and build political networks. Some regents managed to consolidate their influence beyond the temporary nature of their positions through strategic alliances and patronage. For instance, Catherine de Medici's regency (reign: as consort 1547-1559, as regent 1560-1563) in France demonstrated how a female regent could navigate complex political landscapes and wield considerable power.

Empress Wu Zetian (武則天 – Wǔ Zé Tiān – 624-705 CE) of Tang China challenged Confucian norms against female rule and was the only woman in Chinese history to rule as emperor formally. She worked her way up as concubine turned empress-consort (after marrying one of the sons of the late emperor in 655 CE), then became empress-dowager (by refusing retirement after the death of her husband in 683 and by not granting the heir (her son) real power); and finally forcing her son to formally transfer power to her in 690 thus establishing the short-lived Zhou dynasty. Wu ruled for 45 years (McMahon 2013).

Although less common than inheritance or regency, some women came to power through usurpation by seizing control from male relatives or rivals. Female usurpers often faced intense challenges in legitimizing their rule due to societal biases favoring male leadership. They typically sought to justify their authority by emphasizing their connection to previous rulers or employing propaganda to bolster their image. A notable example is Catherine II the Great (born Princess Sophie of Anhalt-Zerbst, reign: 1762-1796), who rallied the Ismailovsky regiment (in which her lover (Grigory Orlov) and his brother (Aleksei) had great standing) to move against her unpopular husband, Tsar Paul III, and convincing the other praetorian Preobrazhensky and Semenovsky regiments to secure her coup (Ivleva 2015). She successfully seized the throne from her husband and solidified her position through political maneuvering and a cultivated image as an enlightened monarch.

Other pathways included election in certain contexts, such as in elective monarchies where queens could ascend to power through complex political alliances and religious considerations. (Woodacre 2018) Overall, the pathways to power for female rulers were diverse but consistently shaped by societal norms and cultural contexts that both constrained and enabled women's access to leadership roles (Duindam 2021). Despite obstacles to female rule, women often rose to power as an ad hoc solution in the absence of male successors, sometimes establishing prolonged periods of female leadership. For example, Queen Nzinga's defiance of gender norms in Angola ushered in a century of predominance by female rulers. Similarly, Madagascar saw queens ruling in its principalities and four queens-regnant leading the Kingdom of Madagascar between 1828 and 1897 (Duindam 2021).

A broad overview of the world between 1300 and 1900 reveals interesting patterns regarding female sovereignty. In the Middle East and North Africa, no woman appears to have exercised sovereign power over an independent state during this period. However, some women wielded significant authority as regents, particularly during the so-called 'century of women' in the seventeenth-century Ottoman Empire. In East Asia, female sovereignty was similarly rare, with only two women serving as Japanese emperors (tennō), both as figureheads. Nonetheless, royal women occasionally held de facto influence in this region (Amirell 2015; Duindam 2021).

Female rule was somewhat more frequent in Sub Saharan Africa, Central Asia, and mainland South Asia. However, the historical record for these regions is often sparse, limiting our understanding of their roles. In pre-Columbian America, sources are similarly scarce, making it difficult to assess the prevalence of female rulers. These patterns highlight the regional and cultural variations in the acceptance and practice of female sovereignty, shaped by societal norms and historical contingencies (Amirell 2015; Duindam 2021; Gomez 2018; Saidi 2012).

Female Presidents, Prime Ministers & Dictators

Women in modern times have risen to power through a variety of pathways shaped by historical, political, and cultural factors, as well as evolving societal norms. Traditionally excluded from leadership roles, especially in male-dominated spheres such as the military or defense ministries, women have increasingly gained access to power due to shifts in societal attitudes, institutional reforms, and global advocacy for gender equality.

One significant factor has been the changing nature of political institutions and leadership roles. For instance, the role of defense ministers has evolved in many countries from a focus on military aggression to one emphasizing peacekeeping and diplomacy. This shift has made such positions less stereotypically masculine, allowing women to assume these roles. Michelle Bachelet's appointment as Chile's defense minister in 2002 exemplifies this transformation; her appointment symbolized a break from Chile's authoritarian past and reflected a redefined role for the military (Barnes & O'Brien 2018).

Family connections have also played a pivotal role in women's ascent to power in modern times. Sirimavo Bandaranaike (1916-2000) of Sri Lanka (Ceylon) was the first female prime minister in the world in 1960. Indira Gandhi (1917-1984) became the prime minister of India in 1966. Like Bandaranaike, she benefited from her family connection as the daughter of Jawaharlal Nehru, India's first prime minister. Isabel Perón of Argentina became the president of Argentina in 1974 (and the first female president in the Americas). She was the widow of Juan Perón, who had been president three times. She became vice president in 1973 and assumed the presidency upon her husband's death. She was ousted in 1976 by a military coup.

These cases demonstrate how hereditary charisma often outweighed considerations of gender or competence when selecting successors for deceased leaders. However, not all women relied on such connections. Leaders like Golda Meir (1898-1978) of Israel (in 1969) and Elisabeth Domitien (ca. 1925-2005) of the Central African Republic (CAR) gained power through long careers in politics or grassroots mobilization, breaking traditional gender roles early in their lives and accumulating political experience that set them apart (Skard 2022).

In 1972, Jean-Bédel Bokassa in CAR named Elisabeth Domitien vice president of his party, and in 1973 she led the first national congress of Central African farmers. Known for her industriousness and popularity, Domitien served as a unifying figure for Bokassa's regime. In 1975, during the International Women's Year, Bokassa created the position of prime minister and appointed Domitien, making her the first female prime minister in Africa. This move was partly aimed at gaining international recognition. Nonetheless, as prime minister, Domitien worked to improve women's income and status and was not afraid to speak her mind against Bokassa. When she objected to his plan to crown himself emperor, he dismissed her and her cabinet in April 1976 (Skard 2022).

Global advocacy efforts and legal frameworks have further supported women's rise to power. The adoption of international conventions such as the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) in 1979 has been instrumental in reducing gender inequality. Countries that ratified CEDAW have made more significant strides in increasing women's political participation than those that did not. Events like the United Nations' International Women's Year in 1975 also heightened global awareness about gender issues, fostering greater political engagement among women. Grassroots activism has been another critical driver. Women's movements have historically mobilized around issues of equality and representation, creating pathways for women to enter politics (Skard 2022).

Regional trends also highlight progress toward gender parity. Nordic countries stand out for their high percentage of female leaders and parliamentarians, setting benchmarks for inclusive governance. These advancements reflect broader societal acceptance of women in leadership roles and structural efforts to create opportunities for female representation. (Skard 2022)

Despite these gains, significant challenges persist. Women still face structural barriers within political systems, gender stereotypes, limited access to resources and networks, and discriminatory practices that hinder their progress. By 2010, women comprised only 6% of the world's presidents and prime ministers – a record high but still indicative of a substantial gender gap. Although 37 women rose to power in developing countries and 36 in industrialized ones, the higher proportion of industrialized countries with female leaders (40% compared to 20% in developing countries) reflects more favorable conditions for female leadership in wealthier nations, influenced by factors such as health, education, and income (Skard 2022)

Positive measures such as gender quotas have been instrumental in increasing women's political participation. These quotas take various forms, including legislated candidate quotas, reserved parliamentary seats, and voluntary party quotas. They have been particularly effective in regions like Latin America and Sub Saharan Africa, where they have significantly increased women's representation in parliaments. However, their success varies depending on the political system and context: In dictatorships particularly, such measures implementing gender equality are often purely aimed at obtaining external legitimacy (Bjarnegård & Donno 2023; Noh 2023; Skard 2022).

Supportive political systems and networks tend to facilitate women's rise to power: Proportional representation electoral systems tend to be more favorable for electing women compared to majoritarian systems. Strong democratic institutions are conducive to women's political advancements (Skard 2022). A familial affinity for politics, mentorship and support from established male leaders have also been pivotal in some cases – examples include President Tito's support for Milka Planinc in Croatia and President Lula's backing of Dilma Rousseff in Brazil (Skard 2022). However, some women have risen to power even in turbulent transition contexts without fully established democratic systems: Ellen Johnson Sirleaf (Liberia, 2006-2018) and Roza Otunbayeva (Kyrgyzstan, 2010-2011).

Nevertheless, while (democratic) elections bring these women into the highest national office, not all of them have remained democrats (although many were just elected rulers in regimes that lacked some important requirements to be fully considered democratic, i.e., systemic corruption). Up until recently, most cases of 'female dictators' could be debated, like Indira Gandhi of India, who declared a state of emergency in 1975, granting herself extraordinary powers and suspending civil liberties. Although this period lasted two years, and she eventually restored democratic processes, it remains a notable instance of authoritarian rule by a female leader within a democratic framework.

One indisputable example is Sheikh Hasina of Bangladesh, who served as prime minister for over two decades. While democratically elected, her tenure had been marked by increasing autocratic governance, including suppression of opposition, human rights violations, and restrictions on press freedom. The 76-year-old ruled the South Asian nation of 170 million with an iron fist since 2009. In a watershed moment of discontent, she was ousted by mass uprisings, with violent clashes claiming hundreds of lives, forcing her to flee in August 2024 (Ethirajan 2024; The Economist, 2024; Kabir 2024).

Co-rulers: Wives & Partners The relations of dictators with their spouses, partners, or lovers spark the imagination (as do their sex lives, cf. Cawthorne 1996). While many (first) wives just rear the children and come to terms with their husbands' long absences and serial infidelity once these become rulers, other women are paraded around as first ladies and have important symbolic roles (propaganda). Still, an ambitious few take an active interest in co-ruling and have become as notorious as their husbands who propelled them into power.

Women in the 'inner court' or 'inner circle' – even when formally barred from holding sovereign power, had various resources at their disposition to grow their influence: They often exploited the 'politics of intimacy,' leveraging their proximity to power and informal networks within ruling households to gather information and manipulate decision-making processes. Roles such as ladies-in-waiting, maîtresses, trusted assistants, etc., provided privileged access to rulers, enabling women to act as intermediaries, confidants, and councilors and allowed them to broker favors on behalf of other inner circle members, with the ambition to build patronage networks that extended their reach beyond the 'court.' Strategic marriages (for themselves or their relatives) further consolidated power, as women used these unions to secure alliances and access more resources (Akkerman & Houben 2014).

Take, for instance, Magda Goebbels (1901-1945), the wife of Joseph Goebbels. She was a highly influential figure within Nazi Germany, both as a symbol of Nazi ideals and through her close relationship with Adolf Hitler. Often referred to as the unofficial 'First Lady' of the Third Reich, she embodied the regime's vision of the ideal Aryan woman: loyal, elegant, and devoted to Nazism. Her influence stemmed from her personal connections, ideological commitment, and her role as a public figure in Hitler's inner circle. She acted as a confidante to him and others in the Nazi leadership, which gave her a significant degree of informal power. (Magda's ideological commitment was profound and culminated in her infamous decision during the final days of WWII: she murdered her six children in Hitler's bunker before committing suicide with her husband). For some powerful women in the inner circle, the next level of influence was becoming an (almost) equal, formal partner of the ruler; usually, this required obtaining a marriage (and thus also making sure the ruler gets a divorce).

Co-ruling is not a new phenomenon, although it is rare. As shown in the entry on families, kin play a very important role in monarchies. Usually, mothers or other relatives took over this task as co-rulers: The Akan societies of Ghana, notably the Asante, had a dual-gender system of leadership where every chief was paired with a queen mother. There were variations on the pairing: aunt and nephew, uncle and niece, sister and brother, or cousins. In any case, both occupied royal stools, symbolizing their authority and had separate responsibilities. They were expected to work together in the interests of the people under their jurisdiction (Woodacre et al. 2019). Eswatini (Swaziland) was renowned for this system as well (cf. monarchies in Sub Saharan Africa).

In European and Eurasian monarchies, spouses could become co-rulers. There is evidence that power could be shared both ways. Empress Theodora (reign: 527-548 CE), of humble origins, became a full co-ruler once she married Emperor Justinian I of Byzantium. In the other direction, William III of Orange (co-ruler: 1689-1694, ruler until 1702), a foreigner in British lands, joined the rule of Mary II of England, Scotland, and Ireland by marriage. On equal terms, Isabella I of Castile and Ferdinand II of Aragon (1474-1504) became co-rulers of each other dominions until death parted them. (Ferdinand did become regent of Castile for their daughter Joanna 'The Mad' in 1504. Joanna inherited both thrones from her parents).

Marriages between close kin, including siblings, did not always empower the women involved, especially in the short term. However, these unions often created a form of parallelism within royal power structures that, even if initially superficial, could ultimately enhance women's influence. This long-term empowerment came primarily through their integration into the cultural expressions of royal authority (Carney & Müller 2021).

Eva Perón (Argentina 1946-1952), known as 'Evita,' Juan Perón's second wife, was not officially a co-ruler but wielded significant influence as first lady. She championed labor rights, women's suffrage, and welfare programs, becoming a powerful political figure in her own right until her untimely death at age 33. Perón's third wife, Isabel (whom he met in exile in Spain before his political comeback), became co-ruler in the capacity of vice president, but she became president following Perón's death.

Most attempts at co-rulership do not succeed if they are not formalized in one way or another. Although Jiang Qing (1914-1991) was never given a formal title equating to co-rulership, she wielded considerable power as the wife of Chairman Mao Zedong of the Chinese Communist Party. She held the title of vice premier and served in other high-ranking roles, particularly within the cultural and political apparatus. Her influence was particularly strong after Mao's health began to decline in the early 1970s. After he died in 1976, Jiang Qing and the others of the 'Gang of Four' were arrested and blamed for the excesses of the Cultural Revolution (she committed suicide in prison in 1991).

Co-rulership also has to be fully endorsed by the dictator at a time when he is not yet a lame duck (Box 3.14): Grace Mugabe gained significant political influence in Zimbabwe, particularly during the later years of the aging, ailing Robert Mugabe, already 90 years old. By 2014, she was a key figure in shaping the ruling ZANU-PF party's policies and succession plans. When she tried to sideline Vice President Emmerson Mnangagwa and prepare her ascent to the highest office, the latter rallied the old guard and ousted the Mugabes in the 2017 coup.

Another condition is that the regime has to survive long enough to benefit from co-rulership. Elena Ceaușescu (1916-1989), the wife of Romanian dictator Nicolae Ceaușescu (1918-1989), was an influential and controversial figure during the last years of communist rule in Romania. She held various titles that formalized her position as de facto 'co-ruler,' particularly in the realm of domestic policy, the economy, and the Communist Party. She was executed alongside her husband when the regime was overthrown in 1989.

Also, Rosmah Mansor, wife of Prime Minister Najib Razak, was often perceived as a shadow co-ruler due to her alleged influence over state affairs. Her involvement in the 1Malaysia Development Berhad corruption scandal (1MDB) and perceived excesses contributed to Najib's political downfall in 2020.

Co-rulership with a spouse has advantages for arranging succession and keeping family control over the regime. It solves both the crown-prince dilemma and provides more guarantees that the deceased ruler's wishes will be respected regarding their preferred candidate. Daniel Ortega, revolutionary leader of the Sandinistas who got re-elected in 2007 in Nicaragua, transformed the vice-presidency held by his wife, Rosario Murillo, into a co-presidency in November 2024 (Willems 2024). This means that if either of them dies (Ortega is currently 79 and Murillo 73 years old), the other can oversee the succession of a younger, loyal candidate, probably their son Laureano Ortega.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Female Rulers and Powerful Women in Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Akkerman, N. and Houben, B., eds., 2014. The Politics of Female Households: Ladies in-Waiting across Early Modern Europe. Brill.

Amirell, S., 2015. Female Rule in the Indian Ocean World (1300-1900). Journal of World History.

Barnes, T.D. and O'Brien, D.Z., 2018. Defending the realm: The appointment of female defense ministers worldwide. American Journal of Political Science, 62:2.

Bartlett, R., 2020. Blood Royal: Dynastic Politics in Medieval Europe. Cambridge University Press.

Bjarnegård, E. and Donno, D., 2023. Window-Dressing or Window of Opportunity? Assessing the Advancement of Gender Equality in Autocracies. Politics & Gender, 1:6.

Carney, E.D. and Müller, S., eds., 2021. The Routledge companion to women and monarchy in the ancient Mediterranean world. Routledge.

Cawthorne, N., 1996. Sex lives of the great dictators: an irreverent exposé of despots, tyrants and other monsters. Sex Lives Series.

Devarachetty, S., 2012. Women as charismatic leaders. Doctoral Dissertation, the University of Akron.

Duindam, J., 2021. Gender, succession and dynastic rule. History and Anthropology, 32:2.

Ethirajan, A., 2024. How Bangladesh's protests ended Sheikh Hasina's 15-year reign. BBC News.

Gomez, M., 2018. African Dominion: a new history of empire in early and medieval West Africa. Princeton University Press.

Haeri, S., 2020. The unforgettable queens of Islam: Succession, authority, gender. Cambridge University Press.

Hyde, C.A., 1989. Max Weber Meets Feminism: A Reconsideration of Charisma.

Ivleva, V., 2015. Catherine II as female ruler: The power of enlightened womanhood. ВИВЛИОФИКА: E-Journal of Eighteenth-Century Russian Studies, 3.

Joosse, P. and Willey, R., 2020. Gender and charismatic power. Theory and Society, 49:4.

Joosse, P., 2014. Becoming a God: Max Weber and the social construction of charisma. Journal of Classical Sociology, 14:3.

Kabir, A. 2024. Sheikh Hasina's downfall and exile are of her own making. Al Jazeera.
McMahon, K., 2013. Women shall not rule: Imperial wives and concubines in China from Han to Liao. Rowman & Littlefield Publishers.
McMahon, K., 2016. Celestial women: Imperial wives and concubines in China from Song to Qing. Rowman & Littlefield.
Monter, W., 2012. The Rise of Female Kings in Europe, 1300-1800. Yale University Press.
Noh, Y., 2023. Public Opinion and Women's Rights in Autocracies. Politics & Gender, 1-5.
Prete, F.R., 1991. Can Females Rule the Hive? The Controversy over Honey Bee Gender Roles in British Beekeeping Texts of the Sixteenth-Eighteenth Centuries. Journal of the History of Biology.
Price, M., 2021. 'Blinged out' female ruler may be evidence of powerful women during Bronze Age. Science.
Romberg, M., 2021. Empresses and Queens in the Courtly Public Sphere from the 17th to the 20th Century. Brill.
Saidi, C., 2012. Women's authority and society in early East-Central Africa. De Gruyter.
Skard, T., 2022. Women of Power: Half a Century of Female Presidents and Prime Ministers Worldwide. De Gruyter.
The Economist, 2024. Bangladesh's dictator flees – leaving behind a dangerous vacuum.
Turai, G., 2017. Medieval Female Mysticism and Weber's Charismatic Authority. Belvedere Meridionale, 29:4.
Turai, G., 2020. Medieval Female Mysticism and Weber's Charismatic Authority. The Case of Angela of Foligno. Doctoral dissertation, Corvinus University of Budapest.
Willems, F., 2024. Zeg niet langer president en vicepresident, maar copresidenten: Ortega's trekken alle macht naar zich toe in Nicaragua. VRT Nieuws.
Woodacre, E., ed., 2018. A Companion to Global Queenship. Amsterdam University Press.
Woodacre, E., Dean, L.H., Jones, C., Martin, R. and Rohr, Z.E., eds., 2019. The Routledge history of monarchy. Routledge.

Incumbents

If you want to lead the orchestra you must turn your back to the crowd.
– Islwyn Jeneins
(Submission for 'Thought For Today' for the newspaper The People, 1933)

Incumbents or current officeholders are considered to have several advantages to maintaining their hold on power in autocratic regimes and less so, in democracies.

ORIGIN 'Incumbent' can be found in Latin as incumbere, which means 'to lay upon' or 'remain in position.' In Europe it was originally used to denote holders of a church office (since the early fifteenth century) (Online Etymology Dictionary 2022).

DEFINITION Political science adapted the term for any current holder of a political office or position in the context of the latter's attempts to keep it once their legal term ends. Usually, this process involves winning popular elections (real or rigged), but at times, it can be a confirmation process by the ruling coalition (e.g., the politburo). Since they are holding the reins of power while preparing to extend their mandate, they are in a better position than challengers, hence the term 'incumbency advantage' – see also Box 8.2.

Of course, incumbents can choose not to run for another mandate or can be legally barred from running again due to age & health constraints or term limits they are unable to change. In this case, the literature considers such incumbents 'lame ducks' – cf. Box 3.14.

SEE ALSO Incumbency politics are very much linked to elections, autocratization, personalization and term limits. As shown below, both moderate autocratic regimes and closed ones resort to such affirmation processes, seeking or renewing legitimacy for the ruler(s) or the regime as a whole.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Under democratic rule, the incumbent usually means the person who wants or can be re-elected to hold the position for yet another mandate. Typically, the elected president or member of parliament ballots in another election if the legal regulations allow it (Berry et al. 2000; Leuprecht & Skillicorn 2016) – cf. term limits.

The 'incumbent' in authoritarian regimes is usually associated with the supreme powerholder, political party or other constellation of the ruling elite and the process to re-legitimize their rule. Using 'managed' elections under the control of the ruling authoritarian regime with a clear incumbent and the opposition, perhaps with the utilization of some 'puppet' candidates tacitly working with the regime, incumbents aim to re-establish the hold of power for themselves and their systems (Levitsky & Way 2002).

More moderate authoritarian regimes with a certain degree of media freedom, alternative parties and movements, or relatively developed civic societies are considered high risk for the incumbent process of rules (Finkel & Brudny 2012). The mobilization of anti-regime forces could seriously challenge the incumbent process before, during, and especially (as many examples show) after the election process. To make this process successful, the authoritarian incumbent should introduce several strategies to overcome the opposing elements, ranging from control over the media, administrative resources, and mobilization of state employers to election fraud and threats for the complete humiliation of the opposition and any disloyal or non-managed alternative candidates.

The pre-election phase usually consists of gaining control over the discourse. Jakob Tolstrup calls this the 'no alternative to the incumbent' policy – the most effective way for a successful campaign (Tolstrup 2015: 678). After the crackdown on the opposition (rhetorical or physical), the incumbent mobilizes the masses and creates the notion of irreplaceability. The populist movement applies this strategy even in less authoritarian populist regimes (e.g., Hungary under V. Orbán). If the pre-election phase does not show a convincing chance of winning, the incumbent in the authoritarian regime should apply all tools to get the most ballots and announce its victory (Golosov 2006; von Soest & Grauvogel 2017). The control over the post-election process includes the portrayal of a significant electoral victory (especially after election fraud) to humiliate opponents.

More moderate regimes have two typical development paths of the incumbent process. The first scenario (A) is the inevitable fall of the ruler or ruling party in question. In this case, democratization of the particular country or replacing the ruling elite with another authoritarian group (so-called autocratic replacement) is the most common outcome of such unsuccessful incumbents. When speaking about the post-Soviet area, this happened at different stages of the post-independence history in Ukraine, Moldova, Georgia and Kyrgyzstan. The second scenario (B) of a successful incumbent in a more moderate regime often leads to a regime's autocratization and suppression of elements that might challenge the regime. Following this way, moderate authoritarian regimes can shift to severe forms of dictatorships – cf. personalization.

IMPACT ON POLICY Periodical elections for incumbents are still necessary for authoritarian regimes, especially in those dictatorships where elections do not play a significant legitimization role. The re-election of an incumbent can consolidate the regime for both domestic and international audiences. Moreover, the incumbent re-election process usually validates the previous selection process after the first successful round of elections, showing the firm position of a dictator or the ruling elite.

Established authoritarian regimes can use the incumbent process first to detect the remnant opposition in the country (even beyond its borders), later suppress it, and contain eventual dissatisfaction in society. Therefore, an overwhelming electoral victory for an incumbent is a foundation for dictatorships that require all the techniques to prolong their own rule (Handlin 2016). The incumbent should be able to mitigate the criticism from abroad and supplement the discontent inside the active part of the population (Tolstrup 2014: 675-676).

Finally, the incumbent reelection could serve (as in the case of Russia) as the confirmation of loyalty from regional leaders (Kalinin 2017). In this regard, evidence of turnouts over 100% of the eligible voters in several regions during the fraudulent Russian presidential elections indicates how the local or regional leaders use such processes to cement their own in situ positions and display loyalty.

EXAMPLES Two interesting and, at the same time, different examples of such a kind of incumbent reaffirmation can be found in the 1948 elections in Czechoslovakia (as a confirmation of the communist coup) or the constant re-elections of presidents in Central Asian states (Turkmenistan in 2011 and 2016, Kazakhstan in 2022). In the case of the 1948 Czechoslovakian elections, the communist party (the ruling regime) confirmed its position within the country after a successful coup in February 1948. These 'manifestation' elections cemented the position of the communist party (or the National Front with the other two marionette parties), determined the communist and pro-Soviet path, and opened the room for the final elimination of any opposition or alternatives. The Central Asian cases affirmed the leading position of the president (and their families) over their respective countries and clearly determined their ruling power.

CLASSIFICATIONS The incumbent behavior in political science could be found in the different spheres of the political life of a particular country. Within the top-down approach, we could distinguish the incumbent affirmation process at the leadership (president, prime minister, dictator) level, all the way down to local governments (mayors, members of city/village councils, up to the local communities (village/community heads, the kolkhoz (collective farm) directors, informal communities). Their political parties are another important sphere where political incumbents examine the position and loyalty of the party leadership (the most visible case), but also of party administrators in the political party's executive organs.

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES Political science researches incumbents' institutional role, electoral dynamics of the system, incumbents' behavior and strategies used to keep themselves in power. The institutional role focuses on the formal and informal political systems contextualizing incumbents' political environment and political culture. Election studies look for changes in the electoral processes (electoral laws, constitutions) and technologies for mobilizing voters during pre-election campaigns. Finally, scholars examine the behavior during the election campaigns, including the election management (up to the point of election fraud) and post-election stabilization.

How to cite:

Horák, Slavomír, 2025. Incumbents, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Finkel, E. and Brudny, Y.M. 2012. No more colour! Authoritarian regimes and colour revolutions in Eurasia. Democratization, 19:1.

Golosov, G.V., 2013. Machine Politics: the Concept and Its Implications for Post-Soviet Studies. Demokratizatsiya, 21:4.

Handlin, S., 2016. Mass Organization and the Durability of Competitive Authoritarian Regimes: Evidence from Venezuela. Comparative Political Studies, 49:9.

Kalinin, K.O., 2017. The Essays on Election Frauds in Authoritarian Regimes. Doctoral dissertation, University of Michigan.

Leuprecht, C. and Skillicorn, D.B., 2016. Incumbency effects in US presidential campaigns: Language patterns matter. Electoral Studies, 43.

Levitsky, S. and Way, L.A. 2002. Elections Without Democracy. The Rise of Competitive Authoritarianism. Journal of Democracy, 13:2.
Online etymology Dictionary, 2022. incumbent (n.). etymonline.com.
Tolstrup, J. 2014. Black knights and elections in authoritarian regimes: Why and how Russia supports authoritarian incumbents in post-Soviet states. European Journal of Political Research, 54.
von Soest, C. and Grauvogel, J. 2017. Identity, procedures and performance: how authoritarian regimes legitimise their rule, Contemporary Politics, 23:3.
Berry, W. D., Berkman, M.B. and Schneiderman S., 2000. Legislative Professionalism and Incumbent Re-election: The Development of Institutional Boundaries. The American Political Science Review, 94:4.

Box 8.2 Incumbency Advantage

Bèf pa janm bouke pote kon li
A cow never grows tired of its horns – Haitian Creole proverb

For established democracies, especially the US, many scholars (Cox & Katz 1996; Ashworth & Bueno de Mesquita 2008) find that the incumbency advantage not only has (i) direct effects – tweaking the playing field (gerrymandering) and the value of resources (visibility, staff, funding, media access, connections, cf. patronage) – and (ii) an indirect effect – scaring off potential contenders – but also (iii) a quality effect – the experience of the current office holder compared to lesser or inexperienced challengers during the campaign.

In the last decade, these findings have been nuanced with more comparative evidence since they do not apply equally to all (democratic) electoral systems (cf. Moral et al. 2015). Others even identify a clear incumbency disadvantage (Klašnja & Titiunik 2013) – an 'incumbency curse' – for weak party systems of developing democracies. Eggers and Spirling (2015) suggest that incumbency disadvantage may not be due to a decreased tolerance for corruption (cf. Klašnja 2015) or voter discontent (as often claimed) but rather emerges from the personal appeal of candidates (individual characteristics) and the unpredictable dynamic nature of competition in developing countries.

Arguably, with an uneven playing field, patronalism and widespread corruption, the incumbent advantage is much more pronounced in non-democracies. Incumbents can prevent credible challengers from running, organize vote fraud, or even physically eliminate main opponents, even if election victories do not automatically guarantee that incumbents are immune to ouster by non-legal means post-election. (Egorov & Sonin 2014)

Egorov and Sonin (2014) created a game-theory model to assess when incumbents run after gauging their level of popularity and competence, how formidable, motivated and competent the opposition is, and considering the risk calculation when relying on outright repression. Their model finds that "the most competent or popular dictators run in competitive elections, mediocre ones prevent credible opponents from running or cancel elections, and the least competent ones use outright repressions. A strong opposition makes competitive elections more likely but also increases the probability of repression." (Egorov & Sonin 2014) Seeberg (2019) found that one aspect of state capacity, namely control over territory, aids autocrats in rigging elections, relying on local regime agents to help control the media narrative, inhibiting the work of domestic election monitors (Box 3.3), etc. – thus decreasing a regime's reliance on costly repression.

Baturo (2021) finds statistical evidence that the autocratic incumbency advantage, however, cannot easily be passed on to successors under competitive authoritarian elections – see also 'lame ducks' in Box 3.14. Note that his focus is on electoral succession, not hereditary succession – common for personalist rule – since, in the latter case, elections are seldom competitive. The decreased likelihood of success is based on insights that successor candidates (a) cannot rely on the same level of neo-patrimonialism and clientelism as incumbents, (b) might have difficulties convincing fellow elites – some of them disgruntled rivals disqualified from running themselves – and (c) that higher insecurity about the election outcome might make election officials less committed to perpetrating election abuses, fearing for their immunity in a post-election scenario where the regime candidate loses. Baturo (2021) concludes that in authoritarian elections, not all successor candidates are equal, and some are able to mitigate the incumbency disadvantage better, especially if the regime has a hegemonic party, electoral victory is more certain. Its presence is likely to improve elite cohesion and enable them to manage both the process of succession and that of elections better.

As shown above, the literature has two strands, the main one assessing the phenomenon of democracies and a newer trend focusing on electoral authoritarianism. There is a consensus that the incumbency advantage may result in 'democratic backsliding' (especially in developing democracies), and in non-democracies, it is generally associated with processes of autocratization and personalization, sometimes even leading to self-coups or autogolpes (cf. coups). However, the differentiation of incumbency advantage for different autocratic regime types is still very much understudied, with some evidence that the level of institutionalization, the organizational basis of the regime, and the level of personalism could yield different forms and executions of incumbency advantage.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Incumbent Advantage, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ashworth, S. and Bueno de Mesquita, E., 2008. Electoral selection, strategic challenger entry, and the incumbency advantage. The Journal of Politics, 70:4.

Baturo, A., 2022. When incumbents do not run: presidential succession and democratization. Democratization, 29:1.

Cox, G.W. and Katz, J.N., 1996. Why did the incumbency advantage in US House elections grow? American Journal of Political Science.

Eggers, A.C. and Spirling, A., 2015. The advantages and disadvantages of incumbency: Theory and Evidence from British Elections, 1832-2001.

Egorov, G. and Sonin, K., 2014. Incumbency advantage in non-democracies. National Bureau of Economic Research. No. 20519.

Klašnja, M. and Titiunik, R., 2013. Incumbency disadvantage in weak party systems: Evidence from Brazil. Unpublished manuscript, University of Michigan, 3:7.

Klašnja, M., 2015. Corruption and the incumbency disadvantage: Theory and evidence. The Journal of Politics, 77:4.

Lucardi, A. and Rosas, G., 2016. Is the incumbent curse the incumbent's fault? Strategic behavior and negative incumbency effects in young democracies. Electoral Studies, 44.

Moral, M., Ozen, H.E. and Tokdemir, E., 2015. Bringing the incumbency advantage into question for proportional representation. Electoral Studies, 40.

Seeberg, M.B., 2021. How State Capacity Helps Autocrats win Elections. British Journal of Political Science, 51:2.

Psychological Profiles of Rulers

I know that there are scores of people plotting to kill me, and this is not difficult to understand. After all, did we not seize power by plotting against our predecessors? However, I am far cleverer than they are. I know they are conspiring to kill me long before they actually start planning to do it. This enables me to get them before they have the faintest chance of striking at me.

– Saddam Hussein (1979)

(Cited in Karsh & Rautsi, 2002)

Under what conditions political systems turn into dictatorships has also attracted scholarly attention within the field of psychology, particularly following the conclusion of World War II (Alexander 1949; Gilbert 1950; Janowitz 1950) in an attempt to understand Nazism. This phenomenon has been examined from a socio-psychological standpoint, focusing on the intricate interplay of social, political, and interpersonal dynamics that facilitate the emergence and consolidation of authoritarian regimes.

Contemporary psychological research identifies a spectrum of both innate and acquired personality traits that characterize authoritarian leaders, enabling them to seize and maintain absolute control over entire nations. These studies elucidate that such leaders often arise in contexts marked by significant political and economic instability. Despite their varied backgrounds, authoritarian rulers frequently exhibit similar 'dark' personality traits that initially serve as advantages in their ascent to power but ultimately contribute to their transformation into tyrants. Historical figures such as Joseph Stalin, Adolf Hitler, Saddam Hussein, Muammar al-Qaddafi, and Mao Zedong exemplify this trend, having established regimes characterized by extreme cruelty. Notably, psychological assessments indicate that these leaders rarely display overt signs of mental disorders; rather, they possess a consistent set of personality traits that can radicalize them into terror-driven rulers capable of committing atrocities, including genocide (cf. Box 1.19).

The psychological profiles of these leaders suggest that they may possess an inherent potential for developing brutal personality traits, often combined in 'The Dark Triad,' which includes malignant narcissism, Machiavellianism, and psychopathy. Additionally, elements such as paranoia, an extraordinary ambition for control over others and a predisposition to antisocial behavior are often developed and strengthened during childhood (Haycock 2019). Understanding the underlying psychological mechanisms that drive authoritarian behavior is essential for comprehending the motivations behind their desires to dominate, subjugate, and inflict violence upon their populations.

In psychology, the study of authoritarian rulers' personalities has been conducted using various theoretical and methodological approaches, each offering unique perspectives on the psychological and behavioral characteristics of such leaders. These paradigms include psychoanalytic approaches (A), psychobiography (B), behavioral and cognitive models (C), trait theories (D) and integrative frameworks (E) that combine psychological and socio-political factors.

PSYCHOANALYTIC APPROACHES (A) Historically important, but hardly applicable due to its individual perspective and thus low exploratory power for the study of totalitarian regimes, is the psychoanalytic approach, rooted in Freudian and neo-Freudian theories (Freud 1923; Kohut 1977). Psychoanalytic profiling focuses on unconscious motives, early childhood experiences, and defense mechanisms that shape authoritarian leaders' behaviors. This approach identifies traits such as narcissism, aggression, and paranoia as manifestations of unresolved internal conflicts or compensatory mechanisms for early psychological traumas. Projection, a Freudian defense mechanism, is also critical to understanding authoritarian rulers. They may project their internal fears and aggressive impulses onto perceived enemies, thereby justifying their oppressive policies. These projections serve as a psychological strategy to externalize and distance themselves from their unresolved conflicts. Furthermore, authoritarian rulers often demonstrate a binary worldview – 'us vs. them' – which mirrors the splitting defense mechanism observed in borderline and narcissistic pathologies. The remnants of this approach are also present in contemporary personality profiling, when the leaders' tendencies toward control and dominance are analyzed as attempts to externalize and manage internal insecurities or suppressed fears (Post 2003).

Initially, in psychoanalytic theory, Freud posits that aggression stems from the conflict between the life drive (Eros) and the death drive (Thanatos). Eros serves the survival of the individual and the preservation of the species; in contrast, destructive Thanatos realizes the unconscious desire for death. Freud posits that aggression is an inherent drive linked to the death instinct (Thanatos) and can manifest when individuals experience frustration or internal conflict (Freud 1915). He suggests that when these drives are blocked, aggression may be redirected outward through mechanisms such as displacement and sublimation. Freud viewed the tension between individuals' aggressive instincts and the demands of civilization as a source of both progress and psychological struggle. Civilization attempts to manage this through laws, norms, and institutions. Aggression, when harnessed and regulated, can drive innovation, competition, and the establishment of social structures. In its destructive role, aggression is left unchecked, and aggression can lead to conflict, war and social disintegration (Drndarevic 2021).

If these aggressive impulses are not resolved through sublimation – a process where aggressive energy is redirected into socially acceptable activities such as artistic creativity – they may result in maladaptive behaviors, including overt aggression or violence. When aggressive urges remain unaddressed, they can create a cycle of unresolved conflict that perpetuates further aggression; thus, individuals may displace their aggression onto others or engage in self-destructive behaviors as a means of coping with their internal turmoil. Aggression drives self-destruction, turning outward against substitute objects.

Seen in this way in Freud's early works, the conflict of death drive and aggression is the driving force behind individuals and subsidiarily civilization as a whole, also explaining the desire for dominance, the desire for power and dominion as opposed to death and decay. For this reason, since the early 1940s, the Freudian paradigm, which was the main dogma of psychological thinking at the time, has been used to describe and understand authoritarian leaders.

An example of the use of Freudian thinking to analyze dictators was the report on the psychological profile of Adolf Hitler prepared during WWII (late 1943 or early 1944) by psychoanalyst Walter C. Langer on commission of the United States' Office of Strategic Services (OSS) and officially entitled A Psychological Analysis of Adolph Hitler: His Life and Legend. The report was an attempt to evaluate Hitler's personality and predict Hitler's plans and intentions in warfare. Several predictions made in Langer's analysis were corroborated by subsequent events (Haycock 2019), including Hitler's emotional volatility, which indicated that Hitler was probably a neurotic psychopath bordering on schizophrenia as the war turned against Germany (Langer 1972). Hitler's narcissistic personality traits allowed Langer to predict that, being incapable of facing criticism, he would choose revenge against a despised world, believing to the end in his ideological immortality. Langer also predicted Hitler's refusal to engage in peace negotiations or consider surrender and the likelihood of his suicide in the event of defeat.

Langer's report drew upon written material, interviews with individuals who had met Hitler, psychoanalytic theory, and his own clinical experience. As part of his psychological assessment, Langer naturally turned to early autobiographical themes, seeking traumatic experiences in the Führer's childhood that might explain unresolved conflicts related to aggression, self-indulgence, and a chronic fear of death. He identified potential causes in the deaths of Hitler's siblings during infancy, the loss of his overprotective mother (as Langer perceived her) when Hitler was 18 years, and the presumed violence and corporal punishment inflicted by Hitler's father. While the validity of these themes has been repeatedly questioned (Coolidge & Segal 2009; Haycock 2019), the enduring influence of Freudian and neo-Freudian paradigms continues to shape the contemporary psychological profiling of dictators. These frameworks often highlight early trauma and exposure to childhood violence as key factors underlying their inability to develop effective coping mechanisms, ultimately manifesting in tendencies toward unrestrained brutality and the use of terror to govern through fear (Coolidge & Segal 2009).

Neo-Freudian theorists, such as Melanie Klein and Donald Winnicott (1971), expanded on Freud's ideas by emphasizing the role of early childhood experiences and interpersonal relationships in shaping aggressive tendencies (Klein 1946). Winnicott viewed aggression as a necessary aspect of psychological growth but noted that pathological aggression arises from traumatic experiences. Also, Otto Kernberg's (1992) analysis centers on the psychological underpinnings of authoritarianism from a psychoanalytic perspective, explaining the personality dynamics of authoritarian rulers by the interplay of aggression, narcissism, and pathological defense mechanisms, focusing on how unresolved internal conflicts and maladaptive personality structures shape leaders' tendencies toward control, dominance, and aggression.

Kernberg (2007) highlights that many authoritarian rulers exhibit a combination of narcissistic and antisocial personality traits. These include grandiosity, entitlement, lack of empathy, and manipulative behavior, often reinforced by an intense need for admiration and validation. The authoritarian ruler's aggressive pursuit of power and control is tied to their fragile self-esteem and a deep-seated fear of failure or rejection. A core theme in Kernberg's work is the role of pathological aggression in the personalities of authoritarian figures (Kernberg 2018). This aggression is often rooted in unresolved developmental conflicts, such as early experiences of neglect, abuse, or humiliation, which foster feelings of rage and resentment. Authoritarian rulers channel these emotions into outward expressions of dominance, violence, and persecution of perceived enemies. Authoritarian leaders, according to Kernberg, often rationalize their aggressive actions as necessary for the 'greater good.' This rationalization serves to mask their underlying insecurities while reinforcing their self-image as decisive and righteous figures. Such justification is essential for maintaining their sense of legitimacy and authority.

In later works, Kernberg (2007; 2018) also discusses how rulers adhere to less-evolved defense mechanisms, such as 'splitting' and 'projection.' Regarding the former, authoritarian rulers view others and situations in extreme, binary black-and-white terms, demonizing opponents and idealizing loyal followers. Projection, another defense mechanism, is used to externalize internal fears and insecurities onto scapegoated groups or rival powers, justifying oppressive actions and policies. The intense focus on power and dominance often leaves authoritarian rulers emotionally isolated. Their relationships are typically superficial and transactional, as their narcissistic and paranoid tendencies inhibit genuine connections with others. Dictators' emotional isolation and lack of genuine relationships are conjugated and enhance paranoia and delusional ideation. Kernberg (2018) identifies paranoia as a frequent characteristic of authoritarian rulers. This paranoia stems from internal conflicts and aggressive impulses that the leader cannot acknowledge consciously. Instead, these are projected outward, leading to a pervasive suspicion of others and an exaggerated perception of threats to their authority.

The psychoanalytic tradition is also referred to by philosophy and social psychology within the Frankfurt School of critical theory: Erich Fromm (1941) and Theodor Adorno (et al. 1950) created the concept of the authoritarian personality to explain the Nazi phenomenon of the success of their leaders and public support for fascism and totalitarianism. This framework has been built upon by many others, as shown in that entry. A complementary thread to the analysis of authoritarian personality, but derived from a separate behavioral paradigm in social psychology (not applied here), are the early considerations of crowd psychology (Le Bon 1896), social engineering by B.F. Skinner (1971) and the influential successors to their early theories, as found in Milgram (1963; 1974) and Zimbaldo (2011), in their studies on obedience to authority.

PSYCHOBIOGRAPHY (B) The analysis of dictatorships, which integrates life history analysis with psychological theories to construct detailed portraits of authoritarian leaders, often draws (to varying degrees) from the psychoanalytic paradigm (Schultz 2005). This comprehensive approach employs diverse methodologies, including qualitative research in psychobiography and comparative studies of narrative identity, to examine the life histories of authoritarian figures (Hollway & Jefferson 2000). Psychobiography investigates the developmental trajectories of such leaders, exploring the interaction between personal pathology and historical context (Isaacson 2010). Analyzing critical life events, childhood experiences, and personality development links these factors to leadership styles and decision-making processes (Elms 1994).

This approach provides an in-depth understanding of the nuanced relationship between personal history and autocratic rule across numerous cases. For instance, studies have examined Adolf Hitler and Joseph Stalin, whose distinct personal histories shaped their decisions during WWII. Similarly, a comparative psychobiographical study of Saddam Hussein and George Bush highlights how their contrasting childhoods influenced their psychological trajectories leading up to the Gulf War (Elms 1994).

An early example of this approach is The Psychology of Dictatorship. Based on an Examination of the Leaders of Nazi Germany by Gustave M. Gilbert (1950), which provides a psychological framework for understanding how the personalities and motivations of these leaders contributed to the functioning of the Nazi state. Beginning with an introductory overview, the author sketches the historical background and provides cultural aspects, after which most of the analysis includes the life stories of the Nazi leaders, met by Gilbert as their prison psychologist during the Nuremberg trials of Nazi war criminals. These are based on a summarization of public sources, some autobiographical material written by the defendants while in prison, and Gilbert's interpretation of the results of a few psychological tests: IQ, projection Thematic Apperception Test (TAT) and Rorschach (inkblot) tests (Murray 1943; Rorschach 1942) combined with his clinical interpretations from (direct) interviews and observations.

Gilbert concludes with an elaborated appraisal of the Nazi leadership and categorizes their top leaders into three distinct types based on their roles and characteristics: first group called 'the Revolutionists' or 'Revolutionary Nucleus' – key figures like Adolf Hitler, Hermann Göring, Rudolf Hess, and Hans Frank, who were central to the ideological foundation and aggressive expansion of the Nazi regime; according to Gilbert the 'Revolutionists' were fanatic rebels, idealists, and outright adventurers, under whose ideological banner the movement began. This group tends to exhibit more psychopathology than the other groups (Gilbert 1950).

The second group contained 'Political Bandwagoner' or 'Junker-Diplomat-Industrialist' as Franz von Papen, Konstantin Hermann Karl von Neurath and Joachim von Ribbentrop, "fairly normal though ambitious men" (Gilbert 1950) who aligned themselves with the Nazi Party for political gain and influence, helping the revolution gain legitimacy.

Next, 'Agents of Aggression-Militarist' applied to the career officers of the Wehrmacht, particularly the officers of the General Staff and High Command; military leaders like Wilhelm Keitel and the Schutzstaffel (SS – ϟϟ) leadership like Rudolf Höss, who were instrumental in executing the regime's militaristic and genocidal policies. In addition to the militarists, Gilbert identifies another bulwark of unbridled aggression: the Secret State Police (Geheime Staatspolizei – Gestapo) as 'a special creation of the totalitarian state' (Gilbert 1950) consisting of the Prussian militarists and the SS-police network with its key figure – Heinrich Himmler. Gilbert suggested that the state police largely consisted of schizoid personalities who were particularly suited to carrying out the systematic extermination of human beings.

Although Gilbert emphasized in his conclusion that understanding the psychology of violent dictatorship requires an integrative approach, combining individual psychodynamics with the broader socio-cultural context, his flagship book faced criticism shortly after its publication (Janowitz 1950; Alexander 1949). In his review, Janowitz (1950) argued that the book's deep emotional tone makes it difficult to reconstruct a coherent analysis and fails to uncover the underlying psychopathology. He accused Gilbert of lacking objectivity, noting that while psychopathological explanations were applied to revolutionary and violent Nazis, the more restrained and so-called 'respectable' figures, such as militarists and diplomats, were given 'cultural' explanations. According to Janowitz, this interpretation inadequately integrates personality factors with socio-historical and cultural conditions.

Psychobiography remains a widely practiced method (Post 2003; Schultz 2005; Runyan 2005) for exploring the complexities of human behavior and personality (Isaacson 2010). By synthesizing biographical and psychological approaches, it represents a partially interdisciplinary framework that not only deepens psychological understanding but also offers profound insights into the lives of influential individuals. This approach highlights the nuanced interplay between personal history and psychological theory (Elms 1994).

The criticisms of the psychobiographical approach outlined above remain largely valid: it is often characterized by methodological elasticity, a lack of a unified conceptual framework, and susceptibility to the idiosyncratic preferences of the biographer. Significant critiques have focused on its reliance on retrospective analysis, subjective interpretations, and an overemphasis on individual pathology. Critics argue that this method frequently oversimplifies complex socio-political phenomena by attributing disproportionate causality to personality traits and early-life experiences while neglecting broader systemic and structural factors (Simonton 1994; Winter 2011).

Additionally, the use of anecdotal evidence and psychoanalytic theories – many of which lack empirical validation – undermines the scientific rigor of the approach (Renshon 2006). There is also a risk of confirmation bias, where historical events are selectively interpreted to align with preconceived psychological profiles. The absence of replicability and standardized methodology further calls into question the validity and reliability of psychobiography as a scientific tool. Moreover, its focus on individual psychopathology can inadvertently pathologize leadership behaviors, failing to account for the nuanced interplay of charisma, ideology, and contextual factors in authoritarian rule (Winter 2011).

BEHAVIORAL & COGNITIVE MODELS (C) The analysis of dictators' personalities often focuses on how authoritarian rulers process information, respond to threats, and rationalize their actions. For example, their rigid belief systems and tendency to perceive ambiguous situations as threatening are examined as cognitive biases that contribute to authoritarian governance (Jost et al. 2003). Cognitive models in dictator personality profiling aim to understand how such leaders perceive, interpret, and respond to their environment. These models highlight the role of cognitive schemas, biases, and decision-making processes in shaping a dictator's behavior and policy choices.

Schema Theory, for instance, suggests that dictators may develop rigid cognitive frameworks shaped by early-life experiences or formative socio-political contexts, which guide their responses to challenges and reinforce authoritarian tendencies. Attribution Theory is also frequently applied, emphasizing how dictators externalize blame for failures and internalize successes to justify their power and actions. Additionally, Cognitive Dissonance Theory provides insights into how authoritarian leaders reconcile conflicting information or justify unethical behaviors to maintain a consistent self-image.

While cognitive models offer valuable tools for analyzing decision-making and leadership strategies, they often fall short in addressing the emotional, social, and cultural dimensions of dictatorship. Critics argue that these models risk overemphasizing rational processes while neglecting the irrational, impulsive, or ideologically driven aspects of authoritarian behavior. This limitation underscores the need for a more integrative approach that accounts for the interplay of cognition with broader psychological and contextual factors.

The early foundations of this approach can be traced back to the principles of social engineering (Skinner 1935) and the contemporary assumptions of evolutionary psychology. A notable example of such analysis is Arnold M. Ludwig's King of the Mountain: The Nature of Political Leadership, in which Ludwig examines the motivations and characteristics of political rulers throughout the twentieth century. By analyzing a sample of 1,941 rulers from 199 countries, Ludwig concludes that the drive to rule is rooted in 'primitive, evolutionary instincts' (Ludwig 2002), akin to the dominance hierarchies observed in primate societies. This evolutionary psychology framework suggests that the pursuit of power is not primarily motivated by higher-order ideals but rather by basic instincts for survival, territoriality, and aggression shared with our simian ancestors. While Ludwig acknowledges the influence of historical and cultural factors, he argues that these are ultimately subordinate to fundamental evolutionary forces.

Critics, however, have cautioned against this approach, highlighting its lack of objectivity and tendency toward normative evaluations (Rotberg 2003). Although Ludwig offers an intriguing classification of 377 rulers – categorized as visionary leaders, monarchs, tyrants, autocrats, democrats, and authoritarian leaders – based on 24 criteria such as childhood experiences, mental illness and substance abuse, promiscuity and infidelity, loneliness, longevity, and various personal attributes (family background, education, personality traits, health, political careers, and mental health), this approach has notable limitations when applied to profiling dictator personalities. It risks oversimplifying complex socio-political dynamics by prioritizing biological determinism over nuanced psychological and contextual analyses.

Ludwig employed a range of statistical methods to analyze his data, including cross-tabulation analyses to compare the frequencies of categorical variables across different types of rulers, 'analyses of variance' (ANOVA) to compare mean responses for continuous data among ruler groups, and correlation analyses to assess relationships between continuous variables. He also utilized multiple and logistic regression models to identify predictors of political greatness, which he measured using the Political Greatness Scale (PGS) – a tool he developed to evaluate the relative political achievements of world leaders throughout the twentieth century.

While Ludwig's work provides valuable insights, his emphasis on evolutionary psychology as the primary driver of political behavior risks overlooking the importance of cultural and historical contexts. Although he acknowledges the influence of these factors, his focus on the 'simian' origins of ruling behavior reflects a universalist perspective that may inadequately account for the diversity of political systems and cultural norms across societies. According to Ludwig (2002), extreme acts of tyranny by dictators such as Saddam Hussein, Robert Mugabe, Alexander Lukashenko, or Pol Pot stemmed from an expanding 'sense of self,' which he likened to a 'molten lava flow' engulfing their populations. He argued that this phenomenon aligns with evolutionary mechanisms: the expanded 'sense of self' serves as a means for leaders to fulfill their sociobiological role as the head of the body politic.

Ludwig further drew parallels between human rulers and dominant alpha males in primate societies – such as monkeys, chimpanzees, or apes – who assume greater responsibility for their communities upon achieving dominance. He suggested that this behavior is not artificial but rather a psychobiological adaptation tied to their essential social role. Moreover, Ludwig hypothesized that a neurochemical with identity-diffusing properties might be released in the brains of higher-order primates, including humans, when they attain absolute power. This theory underscores his argument that extreme rulership behaviors are rooted in biological and evolutionary processes rather than purely cultural or ideological constructs.

Arnold M. Ludwig gathered an impressive amount of detail in his analysis, and some of his conclusions based on statistical analyses of biographical data are particularly noteworthy. For instance, Ludwig found that authoritarian leaders predominantly come from lower- to middle-class families with modest means (background). Their parents were predominantly Catholic (52%) and tended to have large families, averaging 5.3 children. Perhaps due to the size of these families, authoritarians were more likely to be later-born males rather than firstborns. They were generally dutiful and respectful toward their parents, being far less likely than other types of dictators to become alienated from their mothers (7%) or antagonistic toward their fathers (11%). Interestingly, they were the least likely (12%) among ruler groups to lose a parent before the age of 14 but were the most likely, along with tyrants (both 64%), to have parents with broken marriages (Ludwig 2002).

Another striking finding from Ludwig's research is the prevalence of violent deaths among twentieth-century rulers (cf. leader fates and assassination). He noted that 12% of all deceased rulers died violently – 7% by assassination, 4% by execution, and 1% by suicide. Within his sample of 377 rulers, this rate was even higher at 18%. Among specific groups, 29% of transitional rulers, 28% of authoritarians, 25% of tyrants, 21% of monarchs, and 20% of visionaries met violent ends through assassination, execution, or suicide. By contrast, leaders of established democracies had the lowest rate of violent deaths at 11%. Ludwig concludes: "As might be expected, these rates were lowest for leaders of established democracies (11%) (...) the conclusion that being a ruler is one of the most lethal activities known to mankind." However, he offers only one explanation for this phenomenon: the evolutionary drive for dominance, in his own words:

"What these assorted results show is that countless individuals will experience great privations, endure terrible suffering, and even risk death to compete for the position of leader. In most instances, they do so long before they have an opportunity to sample or exploit many of the extraordinary perks available to rulers, suggesting that underlying whatever rationales they offer for their actions, a compelling urge fuels their quest. All of these findings are consistent with my thesis that the urge to become "king of the mountain" is what drives these rulers to brave the various dangers, an urge that is likewise found in our simian ancestors when they strive to overthrow the alpha male. Although other interpretations of these findings are possible, none, in my opinion, explains as well why would-be rulers are so driven to court danger, endure so many privations, and even risk their lives to get to the top. Earlier I have observed that under the right circumstances almost any kind of person can become a ruler. However, that does not mean that almost anybody can fulfill the particular requirements of certain kinds of leadership roles. What we now need to explore is what kinds of individuals tend to be drawn to what kinds of rule and, conversely, for what kinds of individuals each of the different kinds of rule tends to be selective." (Ludwig 2002: 124-125)

Arnold M. Ludwig's King of the Mountain – despite its popularity since publication – has faced significant criticism. One of the primary critiques focuses on oversimplification (de Waal 1996). Reducing complex human political behavior to analogies with primate behavior risks ignoring the unique aspects of human social and political structures. This approach often overlooks the critical roles of ideology, propaganda, and social context in shaping the actions of dictators. While Ludwig acknowledges these factors, his emphasis on evolutionary drives and primate behavior as primary motivators undermines their significance.

A second set of objections concerns Ludwig's methodology and sampling. He began by compiling a comprehensive list of rulers using three main sources: Harris Lentz's Heads of States and Governments, E.K. Ambrose's Chronology of World Leaders, and the online 'Rulers.org' database. Ludwig prioritized rulers with actual executive power, focusing on de facto leaders regardless of their formal titles rather than figureheads or those with nominal authority. To resolve discrepancies and ensure accuracy, he consulted additional sources, including Encyclopaedia Britannica, Library of Congress Country Studies, Europa World Year Book, and the Lexus-Nexus Academic Universe.

From an initial pool of 1,941 rulers, Ludwig created a special sample of 377 rulers who met two criteria: they had separate entries in either the Encyclopaedia Britannica or the Encyclopedia Americana, and sufficient biographical information about their personal and professional lives was available in English to allow for in-depth analysis. However, this selection process was highly dependent on the availability of English-language sources and detailed information matching Ludwig's chosen criteria. As a result, his analysis is strongly Western-oriented, and critics argue that his general conclusions are unjustified given the limitations of his sample.

While Ludwig acknowledges that his special sample may not perfectly represent all twentieth-century rulers, he contends that its large size and objective selection criteria provide a reasonable basis for drawing general conclusions. Nonetheless, these methodological limitations raise questions about the broader applicability of his findings, particularly in non-Western contexts where different cultural, historical, and political dynamics may shape leadership behaviors.

Ludwig's work, though situated within a specific sociobiological context, highlights a significant trend in contemporary efforts to explain how dictators come to power psychologically. His statistical analysis, which adopts a bottom-up approach, lacks the methodological rigor of being grounded in a broader theoretical framework and has faced considerable criticism. In contrast, the Trait and Typology-Based Approach, now gaining wider recognition, relies on standardized tests commonly used in clinical practice and psychological diagnosis to study the personalities of dictators.

TRAIT THEORIES (D) One of the foundational and most widely utilized theoretical models in this approach is the Five-Factor Model, also known as the 'Big Five' personality traits. This model has become a widely accepted framework for understanding human personality (Costa & McCrae 1992). Its roots can be traced back to the mid-twentieth century when Gordon Allport and Raymond Cattell laid the groundwork through lexical studies that analyzed language to identify primary dimensions of personality. Subsequent refinements by Tupes and Christal (1961) and later by Costa and McCrae (1985) solidified the model's structure. During the 1980s and 1990s, Paul Costa and Robert McCrae further advanced the model by developing a validated measurement tool, the Revised NEO Personality Inventory (NEO-PI-R), which facilitated empirical testing and widespread adoption (McCrae & John 1992).

The Five-Factor Model remains a cornerstone of modern personality psychology, offering a robust framework for studying individual differences. It identifies five broad dimensions that capture patterns of thinking, feeling, and behavior: openness to experience, conscientiousness, extroversion, agreeableness, and neuroticism – commonly abbreviated as OCEAN or CANOE (John & Srivastava 1999). This model provides valuable insights into personality traits that may influence leadership styles and decision-making processes, including those of authoritarian leaders.

The Big Five personality traits have been extensively validated through factor-analytic studies and are remarkably stable across cultures and life stages (McCrae et al. 2005). Common instruments for measuring these traits include the NEO-PI-R and the Big Five Inventory (BFI), both of which demonstrate high reliability and validity (John et al. 2008). Research confirms the model's cross-cultural applicability, though cultural nuances can influence how traits are expressed (Schmitt et al. 2007). Recent advancements have integrated the Big Five with genetics, neurobiology, and artificial intelligence (AI), exploring how digital footprints can predict personality traits (Kosinski et al. 2013). Longitudinal studies further investigate how these traits evolve across the lifespan, providing insights into developmental trajectories (Roberts & Mroczek 2008).

Through widespread use and numerous studies, general patterns in the distribution of Big Five traits have emerged. Individuals scoring high on openness are described as curious, imaginative, and open to new experiences, while those scoring low tend to be more conventional and pragmatic (McCrae 1996). Openness has been linked to creativity and exploration, with high scores associated with artistic and scientific creativity (Feist 1998; Kaufman 2013).

The second dimension, conscientiousness, reflects organization, dependability, and goal-oriented behavior. High conscientiousness predicts academic and occupational success due to its association with self-discipline and persistence (Barrick & Mount 1991; Roberts et al. 2007). It is also linked to healthier lifestyles and lower mortality risks (Bogg & Roberts 2013), while low scores are associated with impulsivity and disorganization.

The third dimension, extroversion, represents sociability, assertiveness, and enthusiasm. Extraverts are outgoing and energized by social interactions, while introverts prefer solitary activities (Ashton & Lee 2007). Extraversion is associated with positive emotionality, leadership potential (Judge et al. 2002), sensitivity to rewards, and dopamine system activity (DeYoung et al. 2010). It also correlates with higher life satisfaction and social engagement (Breiter et al. 2001).

The fourth factor, agreeableness, reflects compassion, cooperation, and altruism. Highly agreeable individuals are trusting and empathetic, while low scorers tend toward skepticism and competitiveness (Graziano & Eisenberg 1997). Agreeableness fosters social cohesion and pro-social behaviors (Ashton et al. 2004) and is negatively correlated with aggression and antagonistic behaviors (Meier et al. 2006).

The final dimension, neuroticism, measures emotional stability versus emotional volatility. High scores indicate a tendency toward anxiety, depression, and emotional reactivity, while low scores reflect emotional stability and resilience (Watson 2000). Neuroticism is a risk factor for mental health disorders (Widiger & Trull 1992) and is associated with stress-related illnesses and lower subjective wellbeing (Lahey 2009).

The distribution of Big Five traits in the population follows a normal distribution or bell curve. Most individuals score near the average for each trait, with fewer at the extremes. For neuroticism, however, there is a slight skew toward emotional stability; while most people exhibit moderate stability, a minority experiences very high emotional volatility or exceptional calmness and resilience (Schmitt et al. 2008).

Despite its robustness, the Big Five model has faced criticism for several limitations. Critics argue that it oversimplifies personality by neglecting additional dimensions such as honesty-humility or spirituality (Ashton et al. 2004). Others highlight its cultural relativity – while generally universal, it may overlook culturally specific personality dimensions (Cheung et al. 2001). Additionally, the model has been criticized for insufficiently accounting for situational or contextual factors that influence behavior (Fleeson 2004). These critiques underscore the need for complementary approaches to capture the complexity of human personality fully.

The Five-Factor Model (Costa & McCrae 1992) has also been applied to profile authoritarian rulers, identifying low openness and high conscientiousness and neuroticism as significant predictors of authoritarian tendencies. Although the personality profiles of dictators, in terms of the Big Five personality traits, are not universally established, as they can vary based on individual backgrounds, historical contexts, and circumstances, studies in political psychology and biographical analyses suggest that many authoritarian leaders share certain personality characteristics that align with specific patterns on the Big Five traits. These patterns often include a combination of high dominance, low agreeableness, and emotional instability.

While there is no single, universally accepted Big Five personality profile for dictators, research in psychology and political science has identified certain patterns and tendencies that are common among individuals who rise to power in authoritarian regimes. These patterns reflect how specific traits within the Big Five framework may predispose leaders to authoritarian behaviors and governance styles.

Agreeableness Dictators often score low on agreeableness, a trait associated with empathy, trust, and altruism. Low Agreeableness is linked to hostility, manipulativeness, and a lack of compassion. Authoritarian leaders tend to view others as threats or tools to be exploited rather than collaborators or equals. Historical figures such as Joseph Stalin, Adolf Hitler, Kim Jong-Un, and Saddam Hussein exemplify this pattern, displaying cruelty, distrust, and paranoia about betrayal (Nai & Martínez Coma 2019). Low Agreeableness often manifests in aggressive actions such as purges of perceived rivals or dissenters, reflecting a willingness to use coercion and force to maintain control.

Neuroticism Dictators frequently exhibit high levels of neuroticism, particularly in terms of emotional instability, paranoia, and anxiety. This trait is associated with fear of betrayal, hypersensitivity to threats, and a strong need for control. High neuroticism can lead to emotional volatility and insecurity, fueling extreme behaviors such as Stalin's purges or Saddam Hussein's suspiciousness (Millon & Davis 2000). While some authoritarian leaders display selective emotional stability in external crises, their paranoia and fear of losing power often drive policies of surveillance and ruthless suppression (McCrae 1996).

Extraversion Many dictators display high extraversion, particularly in traits like assertiveness, dominance, and charisma. These qualities enable them to project power, manipulate public opinion, and maintain a commanding presence. Leaders such as Benito Mussolini and Saddam Hussein used their charismatic personalities to consolidate loyalty and influence large audiences (Costa & McCrae 1992). High Extraversion can also foster grandiose self-images and a desire for dominance in social interactions.

Openness to Experience Dictators typically score low on this trait, which reflects rigidity, conventionality, and resistance to change or new ideas. Low Openness is associated with a preference for structure and predictability, which aligns with authoritarian policies emphasizing tradition, nationalism, and ideological purity over intellectual diversity or democratic reforms (McCrae & John 1992). Dictators often resist challenges to their authority or innovations that threaten their rigid worldviews.

Conscientiousness Dictators may score high here but in a pathological form. High Conscientiousness in this context reflects discipline, organization, and determination but is often directed toward self-serving goals like maintaining control or manipulating others. Leaders such as Kim Jong-Un or Mao Zedong demonstrated high levels of discipline and focus in achieving their objectives (Barrick & Mount 1991). However, research also suggests that high Extraver-sion combined with low Conscientiousness can correlate with risk-taking behaviors that lead to bold or controversial decisions (McGhee et al. 2012).

While no single Big Five profile defines all dictators, common patterns emerge: high neuroticism (emotional instability and paranoia), low agreeableness (hostility and manipulation), selectively high extraversion (assertiveness and charisma), low openness to experience (rigidity and resistance to change), and pathologically high conscientiousness (discipline focused on control). These traits help explain behaviors such as purges, betrayals, erratic policies, and the ability to manipulate systems for personal gain (Post 1991; Judge et al. 2002).

Research in political science has increasingly incorporated the Big Five model to study political phenomena such as attentiveness (Mondak 2010), attitudes toward political issues (Gerber et al. 2010), party preferences (Vecchione et al. 2011), and voting behavior (Caprara et al. 1999). However, the model has limitations when applied to authoritarian leaders. It does not easily distinguish between specific antisocial tendencies such as lying or vengefulness (Visser et al. 2017), underscoring the need for complementary approaches to capture the full complexity of dictatorial personalities.

The literature points to an alternative set of personality traits, either in conjunction with the other traits (e.g., the Big Five or HEXACO model: Jonason & McCain 2012) or independent constructs named the 'Dark Triad' (Jones & Paulhus 2014; Paulhus & Williams 2002).

The traits in the Dark Triad, narcissism, Machiavellianism, and psychopathy, are often linked to authoritarian leaders (Paulhus & Williams 2002); some research suggests that there are inherent links between the Dark Triad and authoritarian rule (Glad 2002; Paulhus & Williams 2002; Moghaddam 2013; Lilienfeld et al. 2015; Haycock 2019).

These three 'darker' tendencies are separate constructs from the Big Five but often correlate and can manifest in overlapping behaviors. They can be qualified as 'malevolent' or 'aversive' but are still 'within the normal range of functioning' (Furnham et al. 2013) in that they do not represent clinical manifestations of disorders (but can be associated with them).

Both narcissism and psychopathy are (and, even more strongly, were in the past) names of clinically diagnosable personality disorders and have appeared in classic catalogs of diseases, including mental illnesses, such as the International Statistical Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems – 10th Revision (ICD-10) of the World Health Organization (WHO), which is the international standard for diagnostic classification. It is important to note that no manifestation of the Dark Triad is a mental illness of dictators; only it can be considered a 'personality disorder' gone to extremes (Haycock 2016; Kets de Vries 2019). There is an important difference between a personality disorder and a mental illness:

"Specific personality disorders (F60.-), mixed and other personality disorders (F61.-), and enduring personality changes (F62.-) are deeply ingrained and enduring behaviour patterns, manifesting as inflexible responses to a broad range of personal and social situations. They represent extreme or significant deviations from the way in which the average individual in a given culture perceives, thinks, feels and, particularly, relates to others. Such behaviour patterns tend to be stable and to encompass multiple domains of behaviour and psychological functioning. They are frequently, but not always, associated with various degrees of subjective distress and problems of social performance." (ICD-10, F.60-F69 'Disorders of adult personality and behaviour').

This means that a person with a personality disorder is aware of their actions, does not meet the criteria for a psychotic disorder, and yet their functioning deviates from the social norms and rules of behavior commonly accepted in their culture and is characterized by a specific cognitive style and perception of the world, which is judged by those around them as 'rigid' (in an unadaptive, unchanging way, despite changing conditions) and different from that represented by the general public.

As for the elements of the Dark Triad, the first of these, psychopathy, appears in the ICD-10 as a subcategory of Dissocial Personality Disorder, described as follows:

"Personality disorder characterized by disregard for social obligations, and callous unconcern for the feelings of others. There is gross disparity between behaviour and the prevailing social norms. Behaviour is not readily modifiable by adverse experience, including punishment. There is a low tolerance to frustration and a low threshold for discharge of aggression, including violence; there is a tendency to blame others, or to offer plausible rationalizations for the behaviour bringing the patient into conflict with society." – in the ICD-10 amoral, antisocial, antisocial, antisocial, psychopathic, sociopathic and narcissistic, among others, are listed as characteristics of this disorder.

Historically, dissociative personality has been linked to criminality. In 1963, psychiatrist John M. MacDonald proposed a construct later called the Macdonald triad (also known as the 'triad of sociopathy' or the 'homicidal triad') as a three-element set of behaviors whose co-occurrence in childhood is interpreted as a signal of a developing pathological or antisocial personality. One of the early predictors for future pathologization of personality is pyromania and cruelty or abuse of animals, especially domestic animals (animals provide 'practice' for the future killing of humans – cf. Patterson-Kane & Piper 2009). In this regard, based on biographical sources, there is no clear evidence that such behavior is common among dictators, although in some countries, propaganda portrayed dictators with pets to soften their brutal image (cf. 'pets and rulers' in Box 8.1).

According to clinicians, dissociative personality predisposes people to commit crimes, including the most serious ones, such as serial killings (Haycock 2016), but it also characterizes many people who hold high positions in institutions and companies. Apparently, the combination of these three traits allows many people to rise to the top, although this is usually at the expense of hurting those who stand in the way of ruthless leaders and at the expense of weaker people manipulated by them (Kets de Vries 2019).

In the Dark Triad, psychopathy is defined as a lack of affect, lack of remorse, and insensitivity and the second trait – narcissism is described as ego-reinforcement behaviors, a tendency to seek attention and admiration.

The Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (fifth edition) – DSM-5 (APA 2013) is a widely accepted classification system for mental disorders (particularly in the US, whereas Europe traditionally relies on the ICD-10, with comparable disease catalogs), defines 'narcissistic personality disorder' (NPD) as a lifelong pattern of exaggerated self-importance, an excessive need for admiration, and a diminished capacity to empathize with others. According to the DSM-5, the key symptoms of NPD include an inflated sense of self-importance, an intense craving for admiration, and significantly reduced levels of empathy.

Fromm (1964) and Kernberg (1984) have identified malignant narcissism as a rare and extreme subtype of NPD. Current research corroborates this, indicating that while many individuals exhibit narcissistic traits, the full clinical manifestation of NPD is comparatively uncommon. Epidemiological studies suggest that approximately 6.2% of the general population has experienced NPD at some point in their lives, with a higher prevalence among men (Stinson 2008). Other investigations propose that this figure may reach up to 10% in some samples (Ronningstam 2010). Malignant narcissism represents an even smaller proportion of the population, with estimates indicating it constitutes around 4% (Schneider 1975).

What distinguishes malignant narcissism from standard NPD is the former's hallmark characteristic of sadism – a gratuitous enjoyment derived from the suffering of others (Kernberg 1984). Malignant narcissists exhibit profound deficits in empathy, a feature that sets them apart from other individuals with NPD. While individuals with typical NPD may engage in callous or harmful behavior in pursuit of their goals, they may experience some degree of remorse or regret. In contrast, malignant narcissists are characterized by a near-total absence of conscience. They are willing to inflict significant harm without regret and display consistent patterns of cruelty and abuse (Caligor et al. 2015).

Although malignant narcissists can intellectually differentiate between socially defined notions of 'right' and 'wrong,' these concepts lack emotional resonance for them. Unlike neurotypical individuals, they do not experience the socializing emotions – such as love, guilt, shame, or compassion – that regulate interpersonal relationships and ethical behavior (Kernberg 1984; Ronningstam 2010). Their inability to feel remorse or pity underscores their profound emotional detachment and further delineates malignant narcissism from less severe forms of narcissistic pathology.

Currently – due to the stigmatizing impact – the revised versions of the catalogs DSM-7 and ICD-11 no longer use the terms 'psychopathy' and 'narcissism;' there is a greater discrepancy between dissocial personality as defined in ICD-10, and psychopathy and narcissism according to the classical approach. The new criteria in Section III of the DSM-5 for antisocial personality disorder no longer include criminal behavior, instead focusing on personality traits previously attributed to psychopathy, such as increased egocentrism, low empathy, antagonism or disinhibition.

The third trait in Darl's triad – Machiavellianism, described as a propensity for manipulation and strategic behavior – also poses a greater definitional problem. This factor is measured using the Machiavellianism scale (MACH-IV) by Christie & Geis (1970). This scale describes the components of Machiavellian personality: behavioral methods associated with a high tendency to manipulate other people, views on human nature and moral judgments. This factor seems to intersect and co-occur with psychopathy and narcissism (McHoskey 2001), and its meaning and understanding are mainly derived from the appreciation of Niccolò Machiavelli (1469-1527) and his amoral guidelines for rulers.

Linking the Dark Triad to the context of dictatorship and exploring the complexity of psychopathy, these facts and ideas enrich understanding of these personality traits beyond their clinical definitions. They highlight the dynamic interaction between individual predispositions and the social forces that shape behavior, political activity and leadership styles.

Peterson & Palmer's (2019) research considers the effects of the personality characteristics of the Dark Triad on political ambition. The research (based on surveys of US politicians) provides substantial evidence for the influence of the Dark Triad on political ambition. Research on nascent ambition has shown that individuals who express political ambition differ by social background, gender, and personality, but those who score higher in Machiavellianism are more likely to have higher political ambition, more likely to enjoy the specific aspects of campaigning, and more likely to predict they will be successful candidates. While narcissism is related to feeling qualified and thinking about running for political office, individuals scoring higher in narcissism are less likely to express interest in the specific work of political campaigning.

Machiavellianism is consistently positively related to whether individuals have thought about running for office and whether they believe they are qualified. Furthermore, in an aspect of ambition previously unexamined in relation to the Dark Triad traits, individuals scored higher in Machiavellianism are more likely to express a willingness to engage in campaigning. While narcissists are significantly more ambitious; there does not appear to be any relationship between narcissistic tendencies and an interest in campaigning. Peterson and Palmer (2019) find consistently negative and significant effects of psychopathy on a willingness to engage in the specific actions of campaigning, (due to their lack of care for others and a lack of desire to interact with people), which perhaps is a function of the noted tendency for those higher in psychopathy to engage in anti-social behavior.

Other research (Nai & Martínez i Coma 2019) directly links the Dark Triad to political leadership, particularly populist leaders. The research finds that populist leaders tend to score higher on narcissism, psychopathy, and Machiavellianism. This connection suggests that these traits might play a role in the rise and success of certain types of political leaders, particularly those who employ a more aggressive and manipulative style.

The research reveals the main conjunction between the Dark Triad and the Big Five: the average scores on the Big Five personality traits (openness, conscientiousness, extraversion, agreeableness, and emotional stability) and the Dark Triad traits (narcissism, psychopathy, Machiavellianism) for a sample of populist leaders – those individuals high in Dark Triad traits tend to score lower on agreeableness and conscientiousness. This suggests that individuals who are manipulative, callous, and self-centered are also likely to be less cooperative, trustworthy, and responsible.

Methodological concerns have been raised regarding the assessment of personality profiles based on mediated data, particularly whether it is possible to study personality without direct psychological examination accurately. Ideally, a psychological evaluation should be based on a direct interview, as some argue that only such an approach can provide systematic and reliable insights into an individual's psychological profile (e.g., Lilienfeld et al. 2018). However, in the case of political leaders – especially authoritarian rulers – a direct examination is rarely feasible. Even in exceptional cases where such an examination might occur, the sample would be small and highly specific, rendering it unrepresentative of the broader population of dictators.

Nevertheless, many researchers now contend that observing the public behavior of leaders can yield unbiased and systematic information about their psychological profiles (Visser et al. 2017). This perspective has led to the production of numerous studies on the topic (Lilienfeld et al. 2012; Nai & Maier 2018; Rubenzer et al. 2000; Visser et al. 2017; Watts et al. 2013). A notable example is Alessandro Nai and Ferran Martínez i Coma's study, The Personality of Populists: Provocateurs, Charismatic Leaders, or Drunken Dinner Guests (2019). While this article does not focus exclusively on dictators, it highlights common personality traits among politicians with populist tendencies – including elected presidents with dictatorial inclinations, party leaders with extreme views, and influential figures operating behind the scenes.

The study employs a reliable methodology for assessing personalities through evaluations by both experts and voters. This cross-sectional approach appears more robust, as it allows observers – whether experts or lay judges – to provide systematic opinions that can be quantified and compared to measure perceived character and personality traits (Parry et al. 2014). Such methods offer a practical alternative for studying the psychological profiles of political figures when direct examination is not possible.

A key finding of the article is the observable regularity that populists (33 of 152 mainstream politicians in the study) score lower on three Big Five traits: agreeableness, emotional stability and conscientiousness. At the same time, populists score higher on extraversion, narcissism, psychopathy and Machiavellianism.

If we select authoritarians alone from this sample, taking into account those who, despite their strong inclinations, have (I) not turned their countries into dictatorships – i.e., leaders with authoritarian tendencies, such as Andrej Babiš and Imran Khan; are (II) leaders who tried to turn their country into a (full-blown) dictatorship, such as Donald Trump, Aleksandar Vučić, Viktor Orbán, Andrés Manuel López Obrador, Jair Bolsonaro, Cristina Fernández de Kirchner, Ivan Duque Marquez, and (III) consolidated dictatorships like those of Recep Tayyip Erdoğan, Vladimir Putin or Daniel Ortega – one finds that when it comes to the Big Five personality traits, the performance of all populists, regardless on their position of the spectrum of personalization and authoritarian consolidation, tend to hover around the average and do not emerge as a significant distinguishing factor of any dictatorial personality.

Importantly, when comparing the scores of the above rulers with dictatorial tendencies with regular populists (never attaining the highest office), the former's Dark Triad scores are much higher and hover above 3 (on a scale of 0 'very low' and 4 'very high') for narcissism, Machiavellianism and psychopathy, for the extreme cases.

Uniquely, for this group (for every dimension of the Dark Triad studied), the highest (close to 4) scores were achieved by Donald J. Trump, meaning that he outperformed both Daniel Ortega and Vladimir Putin when assessing his first presidency (of course, the US was not identified as a dictatorship because of his score). Nonetheless, this highlights an important direction for further research as well as a significant conclusion regarding the societal efforts to curb dictatorial tendencies. While Donald Trump displayed numerous authoritarian traits and attempted to undermine democratic norms, the institutional checks and balances in the US largely constrained him from fully steering the country toward dictatorship (at least during his first presidency; his second (ongoing) presidency, in contrast, seems to be failing in this regard and is also manifesting state capture by powerful interest groups linked to the Trump administration).

Trait profiling of dictators, while valuable, has notable limitations. Moghaddam (2013) cautions against an over-reliance on dispositional descriptions to explain complex social phenomena like dictatorship. He critiques the tendency to attribute authoritarianism solely to individual psychological traits, such as those associated with the Dark Triad (narcissism, Machiavellianism, and psychopathy), as overly reductive. Moghaddam emphasizes that many individuals possessing such traits never ascend to power, underscoring the critical role of socio-political contexts that enable the rise of individuals predisposed to authoritarian behavior.

Similarly, Gilbert (1950) questions the concept of the 'psychopathic personality,' arguing that it functions less as a clinical diagnosis and more as a sociological descriptor. He contends that a spectrum of psychopathological conditions – from neuroses to psychoses – may drive antisocial behavior, challenging static interpretations of personality pathology. This aligns with broader critiques suggesting that traits associated with the Dark Triad exist along a continuum, resisting simplistic categorizations.

INTEGRATIVE FRAMEWORKS (E) A prominent recent attempt to adopt an integrated multidisciplinary approach to studying dictator profiles is Dean A. Haycock's Tyrannical Minds: Psychological Profiling, Narcissism, and Dictatorship. Haycock offers a nuanced exploration of the psychological architecture underpinning authoritarian leadership, emphasizing the interplay between pathological personality traits and behaviors characteristic of tyrannical rulers. Drawing on an interdisciplinary framework that combines psychological theory, historical analysis, and contemporary empirical research, Haycock argues that many dictatorial leaders exhibit traits aligning with narcissistic, antisocial, and paranoid personality disorders. His work highlights how these psychological proclivities interact with socio-political environments conducive to the rise and entrenchment of authoritarian figures.

Through detailed case studies of historical leaders such as Adolf Hitler, Joseph Stalin, and Saddam Hussein, Haycock illustrates how pathological personality traits translate into political praxis. He identifies hallmark features of despotic leadership – including an insatiable need for adulation, profound deficits in empathy, impulsive decision-making, and a readiness to employ violence – as instrumental in consolidating and maintaining power. Haycock further underscores the centrality of fear, manipulation, and rationalization in sustaining oppressive regimes, providing insights into the psychological mechanisms that underpin authoritarian rule.

While Haycock engages with neurobiological dimensions of personality disorders – such as the roles of the amygdala and prefrontal cortex in emotional regulation and decision-making – he avoids a strictly neuroscientific approach. Instead, he situates his analysis within psychodynamic theory, personality profiling, and historical case studies. This integrative methodology allows for a comprehensive examination of authoritarian personalities within their historical and political contexts.

A key contribution of Tyrannical Minds lies in its synthesis of psychological profiling and political science, offering a multidimensional perspective on dictatorship. However, the work is not without its limitations. Critics have noted that an over-reliance on personality-centric explanations risks reductionism by neglecting the complex interplay of structural, cultural, and institutional dynamics that also underpin authoritarian rule. Additionally, Haycock's use of retrospective psychoanalytic techniques – while thought-provoking – may lack the methodological rigor necessary for empirical generalization.

In conclusion, contemporary research highlights the need for integrative frameworks to analyze the psychological profiles of authoritarian leaders. Existing approaches often provide partial perspectives, prompting calls for models that combine psychological, political, and sociological paradigms. For instance, Post's (2005) 'leader-follower congruence' model examines how authoritarian leaders' traits align with societal needs during crises, while Winter's (2003) motive profile analysis explores power, achievement, and affiliation as predictors of authoritarian behaviors. These approaches stress the importance of linking psychological assessments with broader political analyses to understand dictatorships.

While political science has studied the origins and leadership styles of dictators, it often lacks focus on psychological profiles. Biographical similarities between dictators and non-dictators highlight the need for psychological inquiry. However, psychology has faced criticism for reductionist methods that treat contextual factors as secondary (Miller 1999).

To overcome these limitations, scholars advocate for interdisciplinary frameworks that integrate psychological insights with historical and political analyses (Bennis & Nanus 1985; Bryman 1992; Kirkpatrick & Locke 1991; Langer 1972; Nadler & Tushman 1989). A more nuanced understanding of dictatorships requires moving beyond simplistic trait-based models to consider the dynamic interaction between individual personalities and macro-level structures (Coolidge & Segal 2009; Zaccaro 2007). Such multidimensional approaches are essential for elucidating the emergence, consolidation, and longevity of authoritarian regimes.

Despite progress, much literature remains shaped by liberal democratic perspectives, neglecting daily life, beliefs and the use of force under autocratic regimes. Authoritarianism often arises from destabilizing factors like political instability, economic crises, and social fragmentation. Charismatic leaders emerge in fragile contexts, offering stability and order or promising radical change. Cultural traditions prioritizing strong leadership and societal divisions further enable authoritarian consolidation. However, these dynamics are often overlooked by Eurocentric approaches.

A more immersive methodology is needed to understand rulers and their rise to power. Psychological assessments can serve as an 'early warning system,' identifying traits linked to authoritarian tendencies. However, such evaluations must integrate psychological characteristics with economic and political conditions.

As Haycock (2019) notes, traits like narcissism, Machiavellianism, and psychopathy thrive in crises marked by instability or conflict. During such periods, authoritarian figures gain prominence as perceived saviors offering stability. Early warning systems could expose these risks and counteract destructive leadership dynamics – but can they be stopped?

How to cite:

Barszcz, Joanna, 2025. Psychological Profiles of Rulers, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adorno, T.W., Frenkel-Brunswik, E., Levinson, D.J. and Sanford, R.N., 1950. The Authoritarian Personality. Harper & Row.

Alexander L., 1949, The Molding of Personality under Dictatorship: The Importance of the Destructive Drives in the Socio-Psychological Structure of Nazism. Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology, 40.

Ali, F., Amorim, I. S. and Chamorro-Premuzic, T., 2009. Empathy deficits and trait emotional intelligence in psychopathy and Machiavellianism. Personality and Individual Differences, 47.

Allport, G.W. and Odbert, H.S., 1936. Trait-names: A psycho-lexical study. Psychological Monographs, 47:1.

APA, 2013. Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM-5). American Psychiatric Association, American Psychiatric Publishing.

Ashton, M.C. and Lee, K., 2007. Empirical, theoretical, and practical advantages of the HEXACO model of personality structure. Personality and Social Psychology Review, 11:2.

Babiak, P. and Hare, R.D., 2006. Snakes in Suits: When Psychopaths Go to Work. Harper Business.

Barrick, M.R. and Mount, M.K., 1991. The Big Five personality dimensions and job performance: A meta-analysis. *Personnel Psychology, 44:*1.

Bennis, W.G. and Nanus, B., 1985. Leaders: The strategies for taking charge. Harper & Row.

Blair, R.J.R., 1995. A cognitive developmental approach to morality: investigating the psychopath. Cognition, 57.

Bogg, T. and Roberts, B.W., 2013. The case for conscientiousness: Evidence and implications for a personality trait marker of health and longevity. Annals of Behavioral Medicine, 45:3.

Breiter, H.C., Aharon, I., Kahneman, D., Dale, A., Shizgal P., 2001. Functional imaging of neural responses to expectancy and experience of monetary gains and losses. Neuron, 30:2.

Caligor, E., Levy, K.N., and Yeomans, F.E., 2015. Narcissistic personality disorder: Diagnostic and clinical challenges. American Journal of Psychiatry, 172:5.

Christie, R. and Geis, F.L., 1970. Studies in Machiavellianism. Academic Press.

Coolidge, F.L. and Segal, D.L., 2009. Strengths and limitations of Freudian and Neo-Freudian approaches. Open Textbooks.

Costa, P.T., and McCrae, R.R., 1985. The NEO Personality Inventory manual. Psychological Assessment Resources.

Costa, P.T., and McCrae, R.R., 1992. The NEO-PI-R: Revised Neuroticism, Extraversion, and Openness Personality Inventory. Psychological Assessment, 4:1.

de Waal, F., 1996. Good Natured: The Origins of Right and Wrong in Humans and Other Animals. Harvard University Press.

DeYoung, C.G., Hirsh, J.B., Shane, M.S., Papademetris, X., Rajeevan, N., and Gray, J.R., 2010. Testing predictions from personality neuroscience: Brain structure and the Big Five. Psychological Science, 21:6.

Drndarevic, N., 2021. Psychological theories of aggression. Journal of Communication.

Elms, A.C., 1994. Uncovering Lives: The Uneasy Alliance of Biography and Psychology. Oxford University Press.

Fiske, S.T. and Taylor, S.E., 2017. Social Cognition: From Brains to Culture. Sage Publications.

Freud, S., 1915. Instincts and their vicissitudes. In The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, (vol. 14), J. Strachey et al., eds., Hogarth Press.

Freud, S., 1923. The Ego and the Id and Other Works. In The Standard Edition of the Complete Psychological Works of Sigmund Freud, (vol. 19), J. Strachey et al., eds., Hogarth Press.

Freud, S., 1930. Civilization and Its Discontent. W.W. Norton & Company.

Fromm, E., 1941. Escape from freedom. Rinehart.

Fromm, E., 1964. The Heart of Man: Its Genius for Good and Evil. Harper & Row.

Gerber, A.S., Huber, G.A., Doherty, D. and Dowling, C.M., 2011. The Big Five Traits in the Political Arena. Annual Review of Political Science, 14.

Gilbert, G.M., 1950. The Psychology of Dictatorship. Based on an Examination of the Leaders of Nazi Germany. The Ronald Press Company.

Glad, B., 2002. Why Tyrants Go Too Far: Malignant Narcissism and Absolute Power. Political Psychology, 23:1.

Hansen, S.J., Christensen, S., Kongerslev, M.T., First, M.B., Widiger, T.A., Simonsen, E., and Bach, B., 2019. Mental health professionals' perceived clinical utility of the ICD-10 vs. ICD-11 classification of personality disorders. Personality and Mental Health, 13:2.

Haycock, D.A., 2014. Murderous Minds: Exploring the Criminal Psychopathic Brain: Neurological Imaging and the Manifestation of Evil. Pegasus Books.

Haycock, D.A., 2016. Characters on the Couch: Exploring Psychology through Literature and Film. Greenwood.

Haycock, D.A., 2019. Tyrannical Minds: Psychological Profiling, Narcissism, and Dictatorship. Pegasus Books.

Hodson, G., Hogg S.M. and MacInnis, C.C., 2009. The Role of "dark personalities" (narcissism, Machiavellianism, psychopathy), Big Five personality factors, and ideology in explaining prejudice. Journal of Research in Personality, 43.

Hollway, W. and Jefferson, T., 2000. Doing Qualitative Research Differently: A Psychosocial Approach. Sage Publications.

ICD-10, 2019. International Statistical Classification of Diseases and Related Health Problems 10th Revision. World Health Organization

Isaacson, K., 2010. The Psychobiography of Political Leaders: A Case Study Approach. In Developmental Psychology, Bornstein, M.H. and Arterberry, M.E., eds., Psychology Press.

Janis, I.L., 1982. Groupthink: Psychological Studies of Policy Decisions and Fiascoes. Houghton Mifflin.

Janowitz M., 1950. Review of M. Gilbert's 1950 'The Psychology of Dictatorship.' American Sociological Review, 15:6.

John, O.P., and Srivastava, S., 1999. The Big Five trait taxonomy: History, measurement, and theoretical perspectives. In Handbook of personality: Theory and research. Guilford Press.

Jonason, P.K. and Webster, G.D., 2010. The Dirty Dozen: A Concise Measure of the Dark Triad. Psychological Assessment, 22:2.

Jones, D.N. and Paulhus, D.L., 2014. Introducing the Short Dark Triad (SD3): A brief measure of dark personality traits. Assessment, 21:1.

Jost, J.T., Glaser, J., Kruglanski, A.W., and Sulloway, F.J., 2003. Political Conservatism as Motivated Social Cognition. Psychological Bulletin, 129:3.

Judge, T.A., Bono, J. E., Ilies, R., and Gerhardt, M.W., 2002. Personality and leadership: A qualitative and quantitative review. Journal of Applied Psychology, 87:4.

Karsh E. and Rautsi I., 2002. Saddam Hussein: A Political Biography. Grove Press.

Kernberg, O.F., 1984. Severe Personality Disorders: Psychotherapeutic Strategies. Yale University Press.

Kernberg, O.F., 1992. Aggression in Personality Disorders and Perversions. Yale University Press.

Kernberg, O.F., 2007. The Almost Untreatable Narcissistic Patient. Journal of American Psychoanalysis Association, 55.
Kernberg, O.F., 2018. Treatment of Severe Personality Disorders: Resolution of Aggression and Recovery of Eroticism. American Psychiatric Association.
Kets de Vries, M.F.R., 2019. Down the Rabbit Hole of Leadership. Leadership Pathology in Everyday Life. Palgrave Macmillan.
Klein, M., 1946. Notes on some schizoid mechanisms. International Journal of Psycho-Analysis, 27.
Kohut, H., 1977. The Restoration of the Self. University of Chicago Press.
Langer, W.C., [1943] 1972. The Mind of Adolf Hitler: The Secret Wartime Report. Basic Books.
Le Bon, G., [1896] 2002. The Crowd: A Study of the Popular Mind. Dower Publications, Inc.
Lilienfeld, S.O., I.D. Waldman, K. Landfield, A.L. Watts, S. Rubenzer, and T.R. Faschingbauer, 2012. Fearless Dominance and the US Presidency: Implications of Psychopathic Personality Traits for Successful and Unsuccessful Political Leadership, Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 103:3.
Lilienfeld, S.O., Watts, A.L., and Smith, S.F., 2015. Successful Psychopathy: A Scientific Status Report. Current Directions in Psychological Science, 24:4.
Ludwig, A.M., 2002. King of the Mountain: The Nature of Political Leadership. University Press of Kentucky.
Macdonald, J.M., 1963. The threat to kill. American Journal of Psychiatry, 120:2.
McAdams, D.P., 2006. The Redemptive Self: Stories Americans Live By. Oxford University Press.
McCrae, R.R., 1996. Social consequences of experiential openness. Psychological Bulletin, 120:3.
McCrae, R.R., and John, O.P., 1992. An introduction to the Five-Factor Model and its applications. Journal of Personality, 60:2.
McGhee, R., Ehrler, D., Buckhalt, J. and Phillips, C., 2012. The Relation between Five-Factor Personality Traits and Risk-Taking Behavior in Preadolescents. Psychology, 3.
McHoskey, J.W., 2001. Machiavellianism and personality dysfunction. Personality and Individual Differences, 31.
Milgram, S., 1963. Behavioral Study of Obedience. Journal of Abnormal and Social Behavior, 67.
Milgram, S., 1974. Obedience to Authority: An Experimental View. Harper Collins.
Millon, T., and Davis, R.D., 1998. Ten subtypes of psychopathy. In Psychopathy: Antisocial, criminal, and violent behavior, Millon, T., Simonsen, E., Birket-Smith, M. and Davis, R.D., eds., Guilford.
Millon, T., and Davis, R.D., 2000. Personality disorders in modern life. Wiley.
Moghaddam, F.M., 2013. The Psychology of Dictatorship. American Psychological Association Books.
Murray H.A., 1943. Thematic Apperception Test. Harvard University Press.
Nai, A. and J. Maier, 2018. Perceived Personality and Campaign Style of Hillary Clinton and Donald Trump, Personality and Individual Differences, 121.
Nai, A. and Martínez i Coma, F., 2019. The personality of populists: provocateurs, charismatic leaders, or drunken dinner guests? West European Politics, 42:7.
O'Boyle, E.H., Forsyth, D.R., Banks, G.C., and McDaniel, M.A., 2012. A meta-analysis of the Dark Triad and work behavior: A social exchange perspective. Journal of Applied Psychology, 97: 3.
O'Boyle, E.H., Forsyth, D.R., Banks, G.C., and McDaniel, M.A., 2012. A Meta-Analysis of the Dark Triad and Work Behavior: A Social Exchange Perspective. Journal of Applied Psychology, 97:3.
Oakes, P., Haslam, S.A. and Turner, J.C., 1994. Stereotyping and Social Reality. Blackwell Publishing.
Patterson-Kane, E.G., Piper, H., 2009. Animal Abuse as a Sentinel for Human Violence: A Critique. Journal of Social Issues. 65:3.
Paulhus, D.L. and Williams, K.M., 2002. The Dark Triad of personality: Narcissism, Machiavellianism, and psychopathy. Journal of Research in Personality, *36:*6.
Peterson R.D. and Palmer C.L., 2019. The Dark Triad and nascent political ambition. Journal of Elections, Public Opinion and Parties, 32.
Post, J.M., 1991. Narcissism and the charismatic leader-follower relationship. Political Psychology, 12:4.
Post, J.M., 2004. Leaders and Their Followers in a Dangerous World: The Psychology of Political Behavior. Cornell University Press.
Post, J.M., 2005. The Psychological Assessment of Political Leaders: With Profiles of Saddam Hussein and Bill Clinton. University of Michigan Press.
Ronningstam, E., 2010. Identifying and Understanding the Narcissistic Personality. Oxford University Press.
Rorschach, H., 1942. Psychodiagnostics; a diagnostic test based on perception. Grune & Stratton Inc.
Rotberg R.I., 2003. Review: Gorillas in Our Midst: Rulers in the Twentieth Century. The Journal of Interdisciplinary History, 33:4.
Rubenzer, S.J., T.R. Faschingbauer, and D.S. Ones (2000). Assessing the US Presidents Using the Revised NEO Personality Inventory, Assessment, 7:4.
Runyan, W.M., 2005. Life Histories and Psychobiography: A Methodological Introduction. In Handbook of Psychobiography, Schultz, W.T., ed., Oxford University Press.
Schmitt, D.P., Allik, J., McCrae, R.R., and Benet-Martínez, V., 2007. The geographic distribution of Big Five personality traits. Journal of Cross-Cultural Psychology, *38:*2.
Schneider, K., 1975. Clinical Psychopathology. Grune & Stratton.
Schultz, W.T., ed., 2005. Handbook of Psychobiography. Oxford University Press.
Simonton, D.K., 1994. Greatness: Who Makes History and Why. Psychological Review, 101:4.
Skinner, B.F., 1971. Beyond Freedom and Dignity. Knopf.
Stinson, F.S., Dawson, D.A., Goldstein, R.B., Chou, S.P., Huang, B., and Grant, B.F., 2008. Prevalence, correlates, disability, and comorbidity of DSM-IV narcissistic personality disorder: Results from the wave 2 National Epidemiologic Survey on Alcohol and Related Conditions. Journal of Clinical Psychiatry, *69:*7.
Tetlock, P.E., 1991. An Integrative Model of Conflict and Decision Making in Political Contexts. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 57:4.
Tversky, A. and Kahneman, D., 1981. The Framing of Decisions and the Psychology of Choice. Science, *211:*4481.
Vernon, P.A., Vilani V.C., Vickers L.C. and Harris J.A., 2008. A Behavioral Genetic Investigation of the Dark Triad and the Big 5. Personality and Individual Differences, 44.
Visser, B.A., Book, A.S. and A.A. Volk, 2017. Is Hillary Dishonest and Donald Narcissistic? A HEXACO Analysis of the Presidential Candidates' Public Personas, Personality and Individual Differences, 106.
Volkan, V.D., 1988. The Need to Have Enemies and Allies: From Clinical Practice to International Relationships. Jason Aronson.
Watts, A.L., Lilienfeld, S.O., Smith, S.F., Miller, J.D., Campbell, W.K., Waldman, I.D., Rubenzer, S.J. and Faschingbauer, T.J., 2013. The double-edged sword of grandiose narcissism: Implications for successful and unsuccessful leadership among US presidents. Psychological science, 24:12.
Widiger, T.A. and Trull, T.J., 1992. Personality and psychopathology. Annual Review of Psychology, 43:1.
Winnicott, D.W., 1971. Playing and reality. Basic Books.
Winter, D.G., 2011. Why Personality Matters: The Nexus of Leadership, Personality, and Power. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 101:2.
Zimbardo, P., 2011. Why the world needs heroes. Europe's Journal of Psychology, 7:3.

STATE ORGANS

Armed Forces in Dictatorships

Nine citizens out of ten hate me? What does it matter if that tenth alone is armed?
– Attributed to Oliver Cromwell

The term 'armed forces' refers to the organized military forces of a nation, typically comprising various branches such as the army, navy, air force, marines, and sometimes the coast guard or space force. These forces are primarily tasked with national defense and protecting the state's interests against external threats. They are authorized and maintained by a sovereign state and are characterized by their structured hierarchy, discipline, and use of lethal force for warfare.

In a broader sense, 'armed forces' can also include paramilitaries or mercenaries that are not part of the formal military structure but may perform similar functions or support military operations (although the latter have specific features and functions as shown in their respective entries).

The modern study of civil-military relations can be traced back to the pre-World War II era, with a focus on anti-militarism, as seen in works by authors like Vagts (1937) and Lasswell (1941). The study and its role in politics have evolved significantly since WWII and the emergence of the Cold War, with a heightened scholarly interest in civil-military relations, particularly focusing on civilian control over the military within democratic societies like the US. This interest was partly fueled by conflicts such as the Korean War and events like the Truman-MacArthur dispute (about military strategy and civilian control over the military during the war). Samuel P. Huntington's 1957 work, The Soldier and the State, was pivotal in shaping this field by providing a general theory of civil-military relations (Feaver 1999).

In the 1960s, attention shifted toward military coups in newly independent 'Third World' countries, as highlighted by scholars like Finer (1964). This period saw an increased focus on understanding why military forces played a dominant role in these nations compared to Western societies. The concept of 'political culture' (cf. Perlmutter 1977; 1981) emerged as a key factor in explaining variations in military intervention across different regions. Following the Cold War, there was a renewed interest in civil-military relations in the US, driven by concerns about maintaining civilian control over the military-industrial complex (Feaver 1999).

It is well established that military forces possess several inherent strengths that enable them to intervene effectively in political affairs. First, they benefit from superior organization; even the least organized military units maintain a higher degree of structure and coordination compared to civilian groups, providing them with a significant advantage in mobilizing and deploying resources efficiently. Second, the military often holds an emotionalized symbolic status within society, representing national strength, patriotism, and defense. This prestigious position can grant them a powerful (albeit short-lived) claim to legitimacy in the public's perception. Lastly, the military's monopoly on arms and their exclusive control over weapons endow them with coercive power that civilian groups do not possess, allowing them to enforce their will through force if necessary (Finer 1962; Nordlinger 1977).

The role of the armed forces in dictatorships is multifaceted and varies significantly depending on the regime's structure and nature. Generally, the military plays a crucial role in both establishing and sustaining dictatorial rule, but the involvement of armed forces, as well as their level of politicization, differs. Military actors can run the regime (military regimes) either directly (cf. executives) or indirectly: (i) behind-the-scenes manipulation, (ii) control over cabinet appointments, (iii) blackmail to coerce civilian authorities into complying with their demands (Finer 1962). However, in many authoritarian regimes, they are subordinated to the powerholders (e.g., single-party regimes, personalist rule, monarchies) and are but one pillar of authoritarian control.

Scholars studying military rule argue that military governments typically include a substantial civilian component comprising bureaucrats, managers, politicians, and technocrats. This suggests that a radical dichotomy between military and civilian rule is often unsustainable. Amos Perlmutter (1981: 97), for instance, asserts that "modern military regimes are not purely military in composition. Instead, they are fusionist, meaning they are military-civil regimes." Military dictators frequently incorporate civilian technocrats and political renegades into their governing councils. However, this integration does not eliminate the distinction between military and civilian regimes, although the closer a regime gets to the ideal type of pure military rule, the lower its legitimacy. Only protection pacts (Box 1.2) can extend the veneer of 'legitimate' military rule; in other circumstances, repression keeps such regimes in power.

In many dictatorships, the military is a key player in consolidating power. Military dictatorships are often established through coups where military leaders take control, either as individual strongmen (personalist rule) or as part of a junta. The military's involvement can range from being the supreme political authority (cf. military regimes) to serving as a tool for authoritarian leaders to maintain control.

In all regimes, the armed forces are usually divided into several branches, each with specific mandates and scopes of operation, translated into diverse attributes regarding autonomy, communication lines, hierarchy, internal control over advancements, reputation, recruitment processes, and training. Typically, the army is the most influential branch in military coups and dictatorships due to its size and ground presence. It often leads coups and holds significant sway over national politics. The navy and air force may play supportive roles in coups but are generally less involved in direct governance compared to the army. Their involvement varies depending on the country's specific political and military context (and geography).

In some regimes, paramilitary forces or national police are integrated into the power structure, either supporting or counterbalancing traditional military branches. Police forces are usually not used when executing coups unless in a supportive capacity. Paramilitaries are often used in civilian dictatorships to counterbalance the influence and potential threat posed by the armed forces.

Overall, while the role of armed forces in dictatorships can vary widely, they generally serve as both a source of power and a stabilizing force for authoritarian regimes. However, if they rule directly, such regimes do usually not last long. In any case, the 'guardianship dilemma' applies – the need for a strong military to protect against external threats vs. the risk that the same military might overthrow the regime it is sworn to protect – and coup-proofing measures by the leadership always result in additional tensions with and within the armed forces. This has significant implications for governance and political stability (and eventual transitions). Notably, units like the presidential guard or equivalent are closely associated with the inner sanctum of dictatorships where they operate, often resulting in complex relationships with other factions of the regime's inner circle. Rebel regimes are also an exception; while they may have a military structure, they often lack the training and professionalism of regular armed forces, leading to variations in discipline and organizational behavior when they take over.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Armed Forces in Dictatorships, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Feaver, P.D., 1999. Civil-military relations. Annual review of political science, 2:1.

Finer, S.E., 1962. The Man on Horseback: The Role of the Military in Politics. Pall Mall Press.

Huntington, S.P., 1957. The Soldier and the State: The Theory and Politics of Civil-Military Relations. Belknap Press of Harvard University Press.

Lasswell, H.D., 1941. The garrison state and specialists on violence. American Journal of Sociology, 46.

Maniruzzaman, T., 1992. Military Dictatorships. In Encyclopedia of Government and Politics, Hawkesworth, M. and Kogan, M., eds., Routledge.

Nordlinger E., 1977. Soldiers in Politics: Military Coups and Governments. Prentice-Hall.

Perlmutter, A., 1977. The Military and Politics in Modern Times: On Professionals, Praetorians, and Revolutionary Soldiers. Yale University Press.

Perlmutter, A., 1981. The comparative analysis of military regimes: formations, aspirations and achievements. World Politics, 33:1.

Vagts A. 1937. A History of Militarism: A Romance and Realities of a Profession. Norton.

Bureaucracies in Authoritarian Regimes

Every revolution evaporates and leaves behind only the slime of a new bureaucracy.
– Franz Kafka, Bohemian novelist

Bureaucracy, the rule of no one, has become the modern form of despotism.
– Mary McCarthy, American novelist and political activist

In academic discourse, bureaucracy can be synonymous with public or state administration or government, or it can be perceived as a rational-legal type of administration in the Weberian sense (cf. Max Weber). While bureaucracies are frequently considered the most standardized institutions across political systems and regimes, differences between them are often larger than similarities. In particular, this is valid for differences between bureaucracies in democratic and authoritarian regimes. While in democracies, the main role of bureaucracies is the implementation of policies, in authoritarian regimes bureaucracies have a dual nature and, in addition to administering government policies, also exercise effective control over society.

DEFINITION Bureaucracy refers to a hierarchical and formal organizational structure that is characterized by a set of established rules, procedures, and roles to efficiently manage and coordinate complex activities within government institutions at various levels. In Weberian terms, bureaucracy is responsible for implementing and enforcing policies and laws enacted by the government. However, the present understanding of bureaucracy is far more complex.

For example, James Q. Wilson (1989: 10) does not provide any definition of bureaucracy sensu stricto but argues that it is "a complex and varied phenomenon, not a simple social category or political epithet." Johan P. Olsen (2006: 3-4) understands bureaucracy as an ideal type, which can be characterized "as a rational tool for executing the commands of elected leaders;" but also "as an institution with a raison d'être and organizational and normative principles of its own." In Olsen's opinion, public administration, in practice at best, approximates the ideal type of bureaucracy with its clear characteristics, preconditions, and effects.

According to B. Guy Peters (2015: 219), who approaches bureaucracies from the structural-functionalist perspective, modern bureaucracies translate political decisions into action, exercise delegated powers and provide advice and expertise to politicians. Furthermore, at least in democratic societies, bureaucracies work "outwards to the numerous stakeholders involved with their policies, attempting to balance the views of the multiple actors and still maintain some commitment to a broader public interest." In terms of bureaucracies in authoritarian regimes, B. Guy Peters (2021: 3) argues that while public administrations in authoritarianism are doing most of the same things that public bureaucracies do in democracies, such as advise on policy, make rules, make budgets, coordinate actions, deliver public services, monitor policies, and audit their activities, they may do them differently.

SEE ALSO Bureaucracies are an important pillar of governance, besides executives, legislatures and judiciaries. Some forms are deeply linked with some cold-war regime types like bureaucratic authoritarianism. Moreover, their behavior under neo-patrimonialism (in how they blend with various forms of informality) has been a key perspective in their study.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Shmuel Eisenstadt (1959: 303) argues that there are basically two points of view on bureaucracy. From the first point of view, bureaucracy is discerned as a modern legal-rational form of administration or "a tool, or a mechanism created for the successful and efficient implementation of a certain goal or goals." From the second point of view, bureaucracy is mainly seen as "an instrument of power, of exercising control over people and over different spheres of life, and of continuous expansion of such power either in the interests of the bureaucracy itself or in the interests of some (often sinister) master."

What Eisenstadt calls the second point of view has been frequently employed by critics of bureaucracies. These include writers such as Honoré de Balzac, Franz Kafka, and Joseph Heller, who ridiculed bureaucrats and bureaucratic procedures; economic liberals such as von Mises (1944: 1), who had no "doubts that bureaucracy is thoroughly bad and that it should not exist in a perfect world;" or modern 'debureaucratizers' such as Osborne & Gaebler (1993), who understand bureaucracy as an inefficient top-down organized monopoly and call for its downsizing, deregulation, and outsourcing of services from private companies. Eisenstadt's second point of view also paves the way for the study of bureaucracy in authoritarian regimes. The handful of authors who have studied bureaucracy in an authoritarian context typically describe it as doublespeak (Riggs 1964) or dual nature (Peters 2023) systems that are often used to exert top-down control at the expense of their effectiveness in implementing policies (Chan & Fan 2021; Peters 2023).

ORIGIN The term bureaucracy combines the French word bureau (office) with the Greek word kratos (rule, political power). It originated in eighteenth-century France, and it is attributed to the French economist Vincent de Gournay, who made the distinction between bureaucracy and bureau mania; while the former term refers to a new form of government based on professional 'bureaucrats,' the latter term refers to a situation in which this form of government becomes an end in itself (so-called red tape) (Albrow 1994: 14; Raadschelders 2012: 142).

However, the bureaucratic form of government has ancient roots, with examples found in ancient states such as China, Egypt, and Rome. For example, Albrow (1994: 16) mentions writings by the Chinese fourth-century-BCE author Shen Pu-hai, who "provided a set of principles which have been linked to twentieth-century theories of administration." During the medieval and feudal periods in Europe, state administrations were less formalized and often decentralized. Monarchs and local lords had their administrations, but these were not as systematic or standardized as modern bureaucracies. The emergence of a modern state in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, particularly in Europe, marked a significant turning point. As states centralized their power, there was a growing need for administrative structures to manage increasingly complex governance issues. The early modern examples of bureaucracies include eighteenth-century France, the Prussian administration under Frederick the Great, and the Napoleonic administration in post-revolutionary France, the latter becoming a starting point in the spread of bureaucratic principles to other countries and continents (Raadschelders 2012: 142).

While most modern writings on bureaucracy mainly focus on democratic countries, it is important to note that the concept as such originated in the autocracies of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries and was frequently seen as a separate form of government by contemporary authors (Albrow 1994: 106). For example, J.S. Mill (1861: 113) described bureaucracy as a political system, where the "work of government [is] in the hands of governors by profession" and differentiated it from representative governments, where power is vested in elected officials. Later authors, such as Frank J. Goodnow (1900), already differentiated between politics and bureaucracy as two dichotomous but closely interrelated systems.

Modern understanding of the term bureaucracy comes from Max Weber (1922), who identified its key features, including a hierarchical structure, division of labor, written rules and procedures, and impersonal relationships. Weber considered bureaucracy as a consequence of the rationalization and modernization of society, of a transition from charismatic rule or traditional rule to legal-rational rulership. Independently from Weber, whose work was only translated into English in 1946, the study of public administration had developed in the US. While Fredrick W. Taylor's work was rather atheoretical and based on experiments, Luther Gulick (1937) provided a descriptive analysis of bureaucratic organizations. The work of Chester Barnard (1938) paved the way for the behavioral and organizational tradition of studying bureaucracy (Kaufman 1960 2017; March & Olsen 1976; March & Simon 1958; Olsen 2006). Using economic tools of analysis, authors such as Downs (1965), Tullock (1965), and Niskanen (1971) developed the public choice theory of bureaucracy, followed by the principal-agent theory of bureaucracy, which draws from organizational theory and post-neoclassical economics (Moe 1984).

Most of the aforementioned research has focused on democracies or, as in the case of the debate between Carl Friedrich and Herman Finer, addressed the question of to what extent bureaucracy can be controlled by elected politicians (Meier & Krause 2003: 4). However, bureaucracy is present in all modern societies, including the non-democratic ones. Indeed, a number of scholars studied bureaucracy in Nazi Germany (Breton & Wintrobe 1986; Peterson 1966), in the Soviet Union (Gregory 1990; Pakulski 1986), and other communist states, such as China (Harding 1981) or Czechoslovakia (Beck 1961; Valenta 1979). An increasing interest in the study of authoritarian regimes in the second half of the twentieth century resulted in the formulation of several types of authoritarianism where bureaucratic government played a major role. The type of bureaucratic authoritarianism was coined by Guillermo O'Donnell (1973; 1979), the type of 'military-bureaucratic authoritarianism' was formulated by J.J. Linz (1975; 2000), and the type of 'bureaucratic-authoritarian communism' was developed by Herbert Kitschelt et al. (1999). These concepts, however, were not meant for studying bureaucracies in authoritarianism but rather for understanding how such regimes function. The systematic inquiry of bureaucracies in authoritarian regimes began only after the institutional turn in the late twentieth century (Pepinsky 2014).

LITERATURE Authoritative accounts of bureaucracy or public administration in general that debate the history of the concept, discuss the main theoretical approaches, and provide overview studies on particular research topics include Albrow (1994), Beetham (1996), Perry & Christensen (2015), and Meier & Krause (2003). The literature on bureaucracies in authoritarian regimes is fragmented into a number of case studies, with the exception of the two summarizing articles by Peters (2021; 2023), the latter being published in a special issue Studying public administration in authoritarian regimes (Asia Pacific Journal of Public Administration, Volume 43, Issue 1).

CLASSIFICATIONS Despite agreement among scholars that types of authoritarian regimes matter in terms of bureaucratic performance (Bolkvadze 2017; Knox & Janenova 2023; Ripoll & Rode 2023), there is no general typology of bureaucracy in authoritarian regimes. Some authors rather focused on typologies of bureaucrats in authoritarian regimes, such as Salazar-Morales & Lauriano (2020), who, in Latin American countries, differentiate among patronage appointees, technocrats, partisan loyalists, and careerists. Hasmath et al. (2019) undertook a similar approach in China, where they recognized three personality types of bureaucrats – authoritarian, consultative, and entrepreneurial.

MEASUREMENT The World Bank Bureaucracy Lab published an open-access data set, World Wide Bureaucracy Indicators, measuring employment and compensation within the public sector. The dataset was compiled for 202 territories on the basis of household surveys and administrative data and covers the period 2000-2018 (Baig et al. 2021). The Bureaucracy Index was founded in 2016 by the Institute of Economic and Social Studies with the aim of measuring the bureaucratic burden, which is a specific time cost. Unfortunately, it has only been compiled for several European countries so far. The bureaucratic burden has also been measured for Latin America using different methodologies (Levy-Carciente 2022).

Several authors attempted to measure bureaucratic performance, such as Rauch & Evans (2000), who compiled data for 35 less-developed countries. The Rigorous and Impartial Public Administration Index relies on expert evaluations and data from V-Dem. It measures how much public officials adhere to the law and administer it without arbitrariness and bias. The Quality of Government Expert Survey developed at the University of Gothenburg is based on a survey of experts and documents the organizational design of public bureaucracies and bureaucratic behavior in 117 countries (Nistotskaya et al. 2021). Data on the quality of bureaucracy in individual countries can also be abstracted from several composite indices, such as the Fragile State Index (mainly the indicator P2 – Public Services) or Worldwide Governance Indicators.

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES Studying bureaucracies in authoritarian regimes raises several methodological issues. Above all, the availability of reliable data. While authoritarian regimes make available fine-grained data on various administrative and economic issues, these data are frequently manipulated and biased and have to be approached with caution (Carlitz & McLellan 2021). Independently constructed indices often have a limited geographical scope (see 'measurement' section above) and are therefore not suitable for comparative studies. Fieldwork in an authoritarian context brings a number of security and ethical issues for both researchers and researched officials. An excellent discussion of the pitfalls of researching bureaucracies in a 'closed context' is provided by Janenova (2019).

EXAMPLES Research on bureaucracies in authoritarian regimes has addressed a number of topics, from the role of bureaucracy in economic development to anthropological studies of bureaucrats themselves. Recently, several studies revealed that some authoritarian regimes often deliberately hinder the effective functioning of their bureaucracies. For example, Chan & Fan (2021) claim that in China, bureaucrats are systematically sent to unfamiliar work environments and that agencies that are more exposed to the resultant inefficiencies are also more likely to come under direct control by senior politburo members (see also: Box 8.4). The pattern of targeted intervention suggests that bureaucratic control in authoritarian regimes is predicated not only on centralized power in general but also on the deliberate creation of friction that prevents independent action from the bottom up.

IMPACT ON POLICY An effective and professional bureaucracy is typically seen as a key condition for the realization of successful development policies (Pepinsky et al. 2017). Knox and Janenova (2023: 18) argue that the character of political regimes belongs among the crucial factors that affect bureaucratic performance; however, as Croissant and Wurster (2013: 4) demonstrate, "the prevalent dichotomy of democracy-dictatorship is of limited use for studying of patterns of performance and persistence across political regimes," and that the bureaucratic and economic performance is more a function of the forms of authoritarian regimes.

For example, bureaucratic-authoritarian regimes of the 1970s and 1980s, as well as post-Cold War electoral authoritarianism, typically rely on bureaucratic and economic performance as a source of legitimacy, and failing bureaucracy and economic difficulties may threaten the survival of the regime (Epstein 1984; Schneider 1992; von Soest & Grauvogel 2017). While Duvanova (2017) investigated how the authoritarian government in Kazakhstan delegates political authority to bureaucratic agencies in order to ensure better economic performance, Knox and Janenova (2023) demonstrated that bureaucratic performance in neighboring Kyrgyzstan is significantly lower because politicians interfere in the work of officials. A relatively large bulk of literature studies the appointing of officials in authoritarian leaders and its impact on bureaucratic performance (Burkhardt & Libman 2018; Chan & Fan 2021; Reuter & Robertson 2012). A number of studies also investigate how bureaucracies are used in order to discriminate against political opponents (Gehlbach & Simpser 2015; Rochlitz et al. 2021). Dozens of authors explored the structure and performance of bureaucracy in post-Mao China (Hasmath et al. 2019; Huang 2002; Jiang 2018; Lieberthal & Lampton 1992).

NEW FRONTIERS Students of bureaucracies claim that most of the research on the topic has been so far conducted on democracies and that also bureaucracies in non-democratic countries should be scrutinized (Peters 2021: 5). The research on bureaucracies in authoritarian regimes, however, is fragmented and is typically realized in the form of case studies and more comparative studies are needed. Ashley et al. (2021) propose three trajectories for further research on bureaucracy, including bureaucracy in authoritarian regimes: to build generalizable theories to enhance global applicability, to be more inclusive of diverse perspectives in the mainstream of public administration scholarship, and to scale up the lens of inquiry beyond the nation-state to include global governance actors and organizations. A growing body of literature (Mussagulova & van der Wal 2021; Ongaro 2021) also points to the fact that bureaucracy has been mainly studied from the Western perspective and that non-Western philosophies of public administration should also be put under scrutiny.

How to cite:

Kopeček, Vincenc, 2025. Bureaucracies in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Albrow, M., 1994. Bureaucracy. Macmillan Press.

Ashley, S., Kim, S. and Lambright, W.H., 2021. Charting Three Trajectories for Globalising Public Administration Research and Theory. Asia Pacific Journal of Public Administration, 43:1.

Baig, F.A., Han, X., Hasnain, Z. and Rogger, D., 2021. Introducing the Worldwide Bureaucracy Indicators: A New Global Dataset on Public Sector Employment and Compensation. Public Administration Review, 81:3.

Barnard, C., 1938. The Functions of the Executive. Harvard University Press.

Beck, C., 1961. Party Control and Bureaucratization in Czechoslovakia. The Journal of Politics, 23:2.

Beetham, D., 1996. Bureaucracy. University of Minnesota Press.

Bolkvadze, K., 2017. Hitting the Saturation Point: Unpacking the Politics of Bureaucratic Reforms in Hybrid Regimes. Democratization, 24:4.

Breton, A. and Wintrobe, R., 1986. The Bureaucracy of Murder Revisited. Journal of Political Economy, 94:5.

Burkhardt, F. and Libman, A., 2018. The Tail Wagging the Dog? Top-down and Bottom-up Explanations for Bureaucratic Appointments in Authoritarian Regimes. Russian Politics, 3:2.

Carlitz, R.D., and McLellan, R., 2021. Open Data from Authoritarian Regimes: New Opportunities, New Challenges. Perspectives on Politics, 19:1.

Chan, K.N. and Fan, S., 2021. Friction and Bureaucratic Control in Authoritarian Regimes. Regulation & Governance, 15:4.

Croissant, A. and Wurster, S., 2013. Performance and Persistence of Autocracies in Comparison: Introducing Issues and Perspectives. Contemporary Politics, 19:1.

Downs, A., 1965. A Theory of Bureaucracy. The American Economic Review, 55:1-2.

Duvanova, D., 2017. Delegation of Political Authority to Bureaucratic Agencies in an Authoritarian Regime: An Analysis of Regional Economic Regulation in Kazakhstan. Studies in Comparative International Development, 52:1.

Eisenstadt, S.N., 1959. Bureaucracy, Bureaucratization, and Debureaucratization. Administrative Science Quarterly, 4:3.

Epstein, E.C., 1984. Legitimacy, Institutionalization, and Opposition in Exclusionary Bureaucratic-Authoritarian Regimes: The Situation of the 1980s. Comparative Politics, 17:1.

Gehlbach, S. and Simpser, A., 2015. Electoral Manipulation as Bureaucratic Control. American Journal of Political Science, 59:1.

Goodnow, F.J., 1900. Politics and Administration: A Study in Government. Macmillan.

Gregory, P.R., 1990. Restructuring the Soviet Economic Bureaucracy. Cambridge University Press.

Gulick, L., 1937. Notes on the Theory of Organization. In Papers on the Science of Administration, Gulick, L. and Urwick, L., eds., Institute of Public Administration.

Harding, H., 1981. Organizing China: The Problem of Bureaucracy, 1949-1976. Stanford University Press.

Hasmath, R., Teets, J.C. and Lewis. O.A., 2019. The Innovative Personality? Policy Making and Experimentation in an Authoritarian Bureaucracy. Public Administration and Development, 39:3.

Huang, Y., 2002. Managing Chinese Bureaucrats: An Institutional Economics Perspective. Political Studies, 50:1.
Janenova, S., 2019. The Boundaries of Research in an Authoritarian State. International Journal of Qualitative Methods, 18.
Jiang, J., 2018. Making Bureaucracy Work: Patronage Networks, Performance Incentives, and Economic Development in China. American Journal of Political Science, 62:4.
Kaufman, H., 1960. The Forest Ranger: A Study in Administrative Behavior. Johns Hopkins University Press.
Kaufman, H., 2017. The Limits of Organizational Change. Routledge.
Kitschelt, H., Mansfeldova, Z., Markowski, R. and Tóka, G., 1999. Post-Communist Party Systems. Competition, Representation and Inter-Party Cooperation. Cambridge University Press.
Knox, C. and Janenova, S., 2023. Does Bureaucratic Performance Vary across Authoritarian Regimes? Asia Pacific Journal of Public Administration, 45:1.
Levy-Carciente, S., ed., 2022. Index of Bureaucracy in Latin America 2022. Atlas Network, Center for Latin America.
Lieberthal, K.G. and Lampton, D.M., 1992. Bureaucracy, Politics, and Decision Making in Post-Mao China. University of California Press.
Linz, J.J., 1975. Totalitarian and Authoritarian Regimes. In Handbook of Political Science, Volume 3: Macropolitical Theory, Greenstein, F. and Polsby, N., eds. Addison-Wesley.
Linz, J.J., 2000. Totalitarian and Authoritarian Regimes. Lynne Rienner Publishers.
March, J.G. and Olsen, J.P., 1976. Ambiguity and Choice in Organizations. Universitesforlaget.
March, J.G. and Simon, H.A., 1958. Organizations. Wiley.
Meier, K.J. and Krause, G.A., 2003. The Scientific Study of Bureaucracy: An Overview. In Politics, Policy, and Organizations. Frontiers in the Scientific Study of Bureaucracy, Meier, K.J. and Krause, G.A., eds. University of Michigan Press.
Mill, J.S., 1861. Considerations on Representative Government. Parker, Son, and Bourn. von Mises, L., 1944. Bureaucracy. Yale University Press.
Moe, T.M., 1984. The New Economics of Organization. American Journal of Political Science, 28:4.
Mussagulova, A., and van der Wal, Z., 2021. "All Still Quiet on the Non-Western Front?" Non-Western Public Service Motivation Scholarship: 2015-2020. Asia Pacific Journal of Public Administration, 43:1.
Niskanen, W.A., 1971. Bureaucracy and Representative Government. Aldine-Atherton.
Nistotskaya, M. et al., 2021. The Quality of Government Expert Survey 2020 Dataset: Wave III. University of Gothenburg.
O'Donnell, G., 1979. Tensions in the Bureaucratic-Authoritarian State. In The New Authoritarianism in Latin America, ed. Collier, D., ed., Princeton University Press.
O'Donnell, Guillermo A. 1973. Modernization and Bureaucratic-Authoritarianism. University of California.
Olsen, J.P., 2006. Maybe It Is Time to Rediscover Bureaucracy. Journal of Public Administration Research and Theory, 16:1.
Ongaro, E., 2021. Non-Western Philosophies and Public Administration. Asia Pacific Journal of Public Administration, 43:1.
Osborne, D. and Gaebler, T., 1993. Reinventing Government: How the Entrepreneurial Spirit Is Transforming the Public Sector. Plume Books.
Pakulski, J., 1986. Bureaucracy and the Soviet System. Studies in Comparative Communism, 19:1.
Pepinsky, T.B., 2014. The Institutional Turn in Comparative Authoritarianism. British Journal of Political Science, 44:3.
Pepinsky, T.B., Pierskalla, J.H. and Sacks, A., 2017. Bureaucracy and Service Delivery. Annual Review of Political Science, 20:1.
Perry, J.L. and Christensen, R.K., eds., 2015. Handbook of Public Administration. John Wiley & Sons.
Peters, B.G., 2015. Policy Capacity in Public Administration. Policy and Society, 34:3-4.
Peters, B.G., 2021. Studying Public Administration in Authoritarian Regimes. Asia Pacific Journal of Public Administration, 43:1.
Peters, B.G., 2023. Public Administration in Authoritarian Regimes. Asia Pacific Journal of Public Administration, 45:1.
Peterson, E.N., 1966. The Bureaucracy and the Nazi Party. The Review of Politics, 28:2.
Raadschelders, J.C.N., 2012. Handbook of Administrative History. Transaction Publishers.
Rauch, J.E, and Evans, P.B., 2000. Bureaucratic Structure and Bureaucratic Performance in Less Developed Countries. Journal of Public Economics, 75:1.
Reuter, O.J. and Robertson, G.B., 2012. Subnational Appointments in Authoritarian Regimes: Evidence from Russian Gubernatorial Appointments. The Journal of Politics, 74:4.
Riggs, F.W., 1964. Administration in Developing Countries. The Theory of Prismatic Society. Houghton Mifflin.
Ripoll, G. and Rode, M., 2023. Is There Passion for Public Service in Authoritarian Bureaucracies? Exploring Public Service Motivation across Regime Types. Asia Pacific Journal of Public Administration, 45:1.
Rochlitz, M., Mitrokhina, E. and Nizovkina, I., 2021. Bureaucratic Discrimination in Electoral Authoritarian Regimes: Experimental Evidence from Russia. European Journal of Political Economy, 66.
Salazar-Morales, D.A. and Lauriano, L.A., 2020. A Typology of the Latin American Civil Servant: Patronage Appointee, Technocrat, Loyalist, or Careerist. In The Palgrave Handbook of the Public Servant, Sullivan, H., Dickinson, H. and Henderson, H., eds. Springer.
Schneider, B.R., 1992. Politics within the State: Elite Bureaucrats and Industrial Policy in Authoritarian Brazil. University of Pittsburgh Press.
Tullock, G., 1965. The Politics of Bureaucracy. The Public Affairs Press.
Valenta, J., 1979. The Bureaucratic Politics Paradigm and the Soviet Invasion of Czechoslovakia. Political Science Quarterly, 94:1.
von Soest, C. and Grauvogel, J., 2017. Identity, Procedures and Performance: How Authoritarian Regimes Legitimize Their Rule. Contemporary Politics, 23:3.
Weber, M., 1922. Bureaukratie. In Wirtschaft und Gesellschaft. J.C.B Mohr.
Wilson, J.Q., 1989. Bureaucracy: What Government Agencies Do and Why They Do It. Basic Books.

Executives in Authoritarian Regimes

Governments and their leaders both attract and repel because they are at least ostensibly powerful and give those who belong to them an aura of strength, of auctoritas, which fascinates, tantalizes, but also worries and, in the worst cases, frightens those who are the subjects and the spectators of political life.
– Jean Blondel (1992: 277-278)

Comparing executive models became all the rage in the early 1990s in the aftermath of the post-Soviet transformations of Central and Eastern Europe when power relocated from politburos (Box 8.4) to executive branches (cf. Taras 1993). The executive branch is a fundamental component of governance across all types of political systems, from the simplest social organizations to complex nation-states. It plays a crucial role in the administration and implementation of policies, serving as a focal point of political life. Such institutions successfully constrain autocrats only when elites are given real access to state power, such as appointments in the executive (Meng 2019). However, defining and comparing executives can be challenging as not all 'governments' are the real locus of power; some have real constraints, others mere façades with power located in a party's top leadership or a tutelary body such as a royal council or Islamic judiciary.

In its broadest sense, the executive branch is tasked with running an organization, whether it be a small group or a large nation-state. Its primary functions include policy conception, implementation, and coordination. Executives can be classified based on their structure – whether they are collective (cabinet style) or hierarchical (constitutional presidencies) – and the concentration of power within them (or outside). Governmental leadership is critical in shaping the executive's operation, with leaders (constrained or not) varying significantly in their influence and effectiveness. Even in consolidated democracies, there is usually a high level of informality and discretion to the (internal) organization of this branch and the recruitment of its members serving as staff or advisers to the executive powerholder. Almost all positions in the executive are political as are the people who occupy them. If the latter are not (merely) technocrats, then the reason for their selection was also politically motivated.

The delineation of who is included is opaque: "It is difficult to define governments as their boundaries are somewhat unclear. For instance, they often include under-secretaries or junior ministers – regarded as members of the government as they are appointed by ministers and leave office at the same time as them – but others also fulfil the same conditions, such as the personal staff of ministers. Thus one may have to take junior ministers into account, as well as the personal staff of leaders, since they may play an important part in decision making. This is the case with many of the advisers of the American president or with the members of the Politburo of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union. While governments may have a clear nucleus, composed of the leaders and at least many ministers, a 'grey zone' whose boundaries are not precise forms, so to speak, the 'tail' of these governments." (Blondel 1992: 268).

Executives can be classified along several dimensions: by their structure (collective vs. hierarchical), by the principle of appointment or dismissal (hereditary succession, military force, ruling party, direct election, confidence requirement), by regime type (democratic vs. authoritarian), and by the degree of 'stateness' – the capacity of the state to dominate society (Teorell & Lindberg 2019). These classifications are not mutually exclusive; for instance, semi-presidential systems combine direct election with legislative accountability.

Democratic regimes feature executives who are accountable through mechanisms such as free elections, legislative oversight, independent judiciaries, and a free press. These systems ensure that executives remain answerable to citizens and other branches of government. In contrast, non-democratic regimes routinely lack or erode these accountability mechanisms. The sources of legitimacy reflect these disparities; democratic executives derive legitimacy from citizen consent expressed through elections, whereas non-democratic executives may rely on tradition, religion, claims of national interest representation, or economic development promises to legitimize their rule. Decision-making processes in democracies tend to be inclusive and deliberative, involving cabinet discussions and consultations with stakeholders and opposition. Non-democratic regimes often concentrate decision-making power within a small elite or a single leader but might resort to co-optation to divide and conquer opposition forces when they have to.

Usually, real power is located in executives, and these are modeled into super-presidential formats that directly dominate legislatures and bureaucracies while narrowing the scope of judiciaries so they can rule unconstrained. In monarchies and ideocracies, there are alternative sources of legitimacy and power is usually located outside the executive, which is responsible for implementation and day-to-day management, but not for important policy-making. In military regimes, the real powerholders do not have a source of true legitimacy and 'hide' behind civilian cabinets, issuing and controlling policy indirectly from 'Supreme Military Councils' or 'Committees of National Salvation.' This approach first emerged in Burma in 1962 and was subsequently adopted by juntas in the rest of the world (Blondel 1992: 273). In most dictatorships, but especially in personalist regimes, the structure of executives does not reflect the actual power relations, and a main function is to offer patronage to regime insiders (cf. prebendalism). For instance, Vladimir Putin stepped down from the presidency in favor of D. Medvedev between 2008 and 2012, taking up the nominally subordinate post of prime minister, but there is no doubt where the real power was located during this 'tandemocracy.'

Studying executive branches today requires moving beyond simplistic classifications to consider regime dimensions that cut across dichotomous categories. Dictatorships can differ more from one another than they do from democracies, and the structure, function and behavior of executive branches are a prime example of this. A nuanced approach involves analyzing both formal rules and informal practices that shape executive behavior, staff recruitment or selection, the real checks on its power as an institution, and its different functions in political systems. For instance, since governments are more visible than the informal leadership behind them, the real powerholders can 'fire' their governments (or force them to resign) to signal a regime's responsiveness to popular grievances and channel dissent.

As with the other branches of government, comparing executives across regime types yields interesting insights into their function, behavior and roles. However, individual careers in executive bodies are rather short (more so in democracies). The tenure of ministers and leaders is typically brief, averaging only four to five years, with few remaining in office for a decade or longer. Historically, communist states saw longer durations compared to other systems, apart from traditional monarchies (Blondel 1985). As a whole, governments, especially ideological ones, can be long-lived, but even as institutions, they are very malleable (extra ministries can be created, and old ones can be merged), and thus, their exact role in stabilizing regimes or enabling transitions is difficult to compare.

In conclusion, understanding executives requires recognizing their idiosyncrasy and dynamism within political systems, and therefore, the scholarly focus has foremost been on the political regimes behind them. The global trend toward constitutional and electoral conformism has strengthened this approach. By examining formal structures alongside informal practices and considering broader political contexts, some comparative insights can be gained, although diachronic perspectives within individual cases can be more useful for assessing autocratic troubleshooting. Because of the dearth of sources on non-democratic executives, the Encyclopedia Tyrannica directs readers to the topics of term limits, succession, constitutional authoritarianism, personalization and the following theoretical frames to assess power relations among elites: selectorate theory, audience costs (Box 7.1) and veto players (Box 6.6). For executives in Western democracies, consult Cohn 2021.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Executives in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Blondel, J., 1985. Government Ministers in the Contemporary World. Sage Publications.

Blondel, J., 1992. Executives. In Encyclopedia of Government and Politics, Hawkesworth, M. and Kogan, M., eds., Routledge.

Cohn, M., 2021. A Theory of the Executive Branch: Tension and Legality. Oxford University Press.

Meng, A., 2019. Accessing the state: Executive constraints and credible commitment in dictatorship. Journal of Theoretical Politics, 31:4.

Taras, R., 1993. Leaderships and executives. Developments in East European Politics.

Teorell, J. and Lindberg, S.I., 2019. Beyond democracy-dictatorship measures: a new framework capturing executive bases of power, 1789-2016. Perspectives on Politics, *17*1.

Intelligence Services in Dictatorships

We did not act according to the rules of a girls' boarding school.
– Markus Wolf, head of the foreign intelligence division of the Stasi (1990)

Dictatorships differ in many substantial ways, but they are all known for utilizing seemingly all-powerful, all-knowing, and all-feared clandestine agencies. These operate relentlessly behind the curtains, gathering information, spreading deception, and sometimes making certain 'enemies of the state' inexplicably disappear from the face of the earth. In the meantime, they make sure that the dictator's secrets remain sufficiently protected. The enormous role of intelligence services is one of the hallmarks of dictatorships, as well as one of its greatest dysfunctions and, quite often, one of its major flaws that leads to their downfall.

DEFINITION Intelligence services (agencies) are clandestine specialized governmental institutions responsible for safeguarding national security predominantly by supporting decision-making through collecting, analyzing, and disseminating information on various individuals, groups, threats, issues, events, and phenomena. They may be assigned other duties that bring them closer to the functions of the police, military or other security institutions.

At the most general level, intelligence agencies can be divided into foreign and domestic. The former operates mostly abroad, whereas the latter concentrates on internal matters. Domestic intelligence agencies are often labeled 'security services' or 'counterintelligence,' but the latter term can be understood in many ways. From a narrower perspective, counterintelligence comes to combating espionage and other forms of external actors' unwanted activities. Some counterintelligence functions are also performed by foreign intelligence services (external counterintelligence). However, counterintelligence is often coupled with related issues, such as countering the proliferation of weapons and certain hazardous substances, combating terrorism and organized crime (especially transnational), protecting classified information and critical infrastructure, and, last but not least, monitoring groups and individuals that may pose a threat to the regime. Therefore, in relation to services focused on internal affairs (domestic intelligence), the label 'security service' may seem more appropriate. In some countries, the difference between the rather defensive-oriented security services responsible for countering state threats, and the more offensive intelligence agencies is clearly highlighted, hence, for example, the name of the Dutch law: Intelligence and Security Services Act. The term 'security service' is even more fitting when an institution's intelligence function is coupled with law enforcement agency (LEA) powers, i.e., the power to use deadly force, apprehend suspects or conduct interrogations and search premises within criminal procedure. This is not a textbook construction, as these are considered two different security areas, but it does happen.

Dictatorships' intelligence services are commonly associated with the function of political police (secret police). The term 'political police' has unequivocally pejorative connotations, evoking associations with suppressing opposition and tormenting dissidents. However, every state, regardless of the type of the regime, including full-blown liberal democracies, cannot do away with some sort of 'political policing' (Joyce & Wain 2014: 216) for the very same reasons it requires public health inspectors or fire departments. All formal and informal radical, extremist, subversive and separatist groups must be monitored and (if need be) combated. What is essential is the scale, means, control and oversight of the function and of the intelligence community as a whole. Its overgrowth and dominance over other intelligence services' functions are typical for dictatorships, as well as the fact that such institutions operate as LEAs.

In democratic states, with broad freedom of speech and political pluralism, this function is carried out in an incomparably narrower scope, is based on the idea of proportionality, and is usually not referred to by the term 'political police.' Rather, the legal terms such as protection of the 'free democratic basic order' (Germany's BfV), protection 'from actions intended to overthrow or undermine parliamentary democracy' (UK's Security Service or MI5) or 'protection of the constitutional order' (Poland's ABW) are used. Also, the function is sometimes associated with the term 'high policing.' Using the term 'political police' in the context of a democratic state is problematic in the sense that it may misleadingly be equated with LEA functions, which is often not the case (and may sound like an insult).

Intelligence services are also divided into a military branch, which is responsible for the protection of the armed forces, its infrastructure and the armed industry, and a non-military ('civilian') branch, which deals with all other issues of state security. The often-used term 'civilian intelligence services' can also be misleading, as it is inherently oxymoronic. Although these are not necessarily uniform institutions (it would be quite a challenge not to stick out from the crowd while wearing a rank slide and garrison cap), they are paramilitary, strictly hierarchical structures equipped with a vast variety of intrusive powers. They are 'civilian' mainly in the sense that they are not a part of the military.

In practice, the shape intelligence services take is diverse and depends primarily on historical conditions and the needs of individual countries. There were and are institutions combining foreign and domestic intelligence (e.g., Croatia's SOA), civil-military hybrids (e.g., Germany's BND), or agencies performing both intelligence and LEA functions. The last of these matters is particularly controversial due to the fact that, as mentioned, the purpose and modi operandi of LEAs and intelligence services fundamentally differ (combating crime versus providing information, respectively). In some countries, combining these two functions is considered ineffective, pathogenic and difficult to reconcile with a democratic order. This model of separation has a long tradition in the United Kingdom, with which it is most often associated, whereas in Germany, the fusion of LEAs and intelligence agencies is outright forbidden.

The reason for such a provision stems from the experience of the period of Nazi Germany. In 1939, many police and intelligence institutions were combined into the Reich Security Main Office (Reichssicherheitshauptamt, RSHA), a quasi-police authority or supervisory body. It included, among others, the Secret State Police (Geheime Staatspolizei, commonly abbreviated as Gestapo), responsible for suppression of opposition, the Kriminalpolizei (Kripo), responsible for suppression of crime, and two divisions of the Security Service (Sicherheitsdienst), internal (Inland-SD), and external (Ausland-SD), responsible for informing on and enforcing various ideological matters. The massive party-state machinery of the RSHA became an instrument of the NSDAP's racial and extermination policy. As Michael Wildt points out, it was "a new type of a uniquely National Socialist institution, linked directly to the Nazi concept of Volksgemeinschaft" (national community). Its functions were "aimed to establish a total racist order and to exterminate the regime's enemies" (Wildt 2002: 17).

Above all, bitter lessons came from the actions of the Gestapo. The relatively small institution, established in 1933, had comprehensive executive powers and operated virtually outside any law, being responsible for countless atrocities. After the war, the Gestapo was, alongside SD, recognized as a criminal organization by the International Military Tribunal (the Nuremberg trials). In 1949, in postwar, Allied-occupied West Germany, American, British and French military governors issued a document in which they agreed that, among others, the federal government should be permitted to establish "a body for the collection and dissemination of information on subversive activities," but that it should not have 'police powers' ("keine Polizeibefugnisse"). Since then, the letter has been known as 'the police letter' (Polizeibrief). The quasi-constitutional principle of separation of LEAs and intelligence agencies was henceforth established (Trennungsgebot zwischen Polizei und Nachrichtendiensten).

Apart from the UK and Germany, separation is also firmly established in, for example, Portugal (SIED) and the Netherlands (AIVD). As one of the officers of the AIVD explained: "The police and intelligence services are two sides of the same coin. They are very close to each other, but they will never touch." (Vis 2012: 9).

However, there is nothing inherently faulty about the opposite model; everything depends on the specifics of individual countries, the shape of their security systems and intelligence communities. Some existing dictatorships utilize it (e.g., Russia's FSB, Belarus' KGB), as well as some democratic countries (e.g., the FBI in the US, Austria's DNS, Denmark's PET, France's DGSI), including those that have experienced dictatorships (e.g., Estonia's KAPO, Poland's ABW). In some countries, this model was used but eventually abandoned (e.g., Lithuania's VSD). As of 2024, in ten of the 27 EU Member States, civilian domestic intelligence agencies perform some police functions. Those that do not rely on LEAs support. It is clear that LEAs and intelligence services must work together and that the institutional and legal framework should encourage them to complement each other effectively.

SEE ALSO This entry is dedicated to intelligence services, sometimes regarded as secret services or reduced to political (secret) police, and, with one small exception, it does not discuss the role of special (operations) forces, military units responsible for carrying out complicated, clandestine missions behind enemy lines (spec ops). Moreover, police services are not discussed here. As the functions of intelligence agencies and LEAs are indelibly intertwined, it is recommended to read this entry alongside the one dedicated to police forces to get a complete picture. Related entries encompass repression, purges, coup-proofing, and informants (Box 3.11).

ORIGIN The term 'intelligence services' highlights the basic function of this type of institution, which is obtaining information valuable from the state's point of view. This is reflected in many languages, such as in Chinese (qíngbào), Dutch (inlichtingen), French (renseignement), German (nachrichten), Russian (razvedka) or Spanish (inteligencia). The tradition of this type of institution is as long as the tradition of the state. Although intelligence agencies as we know them today are a product of the last 100 years, it is possible to trace their lineage back to ancient Rome (frumentarii), classical Greece (kataskopoi), feudal Japan (oniwaban), the early modern papacy (l'entità), Renaissance Venice (camera nera) or Russian Tsardom (oprichnina). It is not without good reason that intelligence is often called the 'second-oldest profession.'

Regardless of the period, geographical location and methods of exercising power, rulers have always been interested in the resources and intentions of their neighbors and adversaries, both internal and external. While striving to guard their own secrets, they try to gain access to the other side's sensitive knowledge, employing scouts, secret collaborators and saboteurs, and hope to predict future events. Achieving any of these objectives would not be possible without properly trained and equipped soldiers, clerks, diplomats, messengers, and other 'special tasks' personnel.

On the one hand, the genesis of intelligence services is most often associated with waging wars – the army needed scouts to count enemy troops and their material, to observe their movements, and to anticipate their plans. Over the centuries, however, knowledge derived from intelligence competed with – and often lost to – superstition: the belief in prophecies and destinies and meanings behind shapes in animal entrails or signs in the sun, moon and stars. Only a handful of outstanding commanders were able to truly understand and embrace the power of 'intel' for conquest. Carthaginian general Hannibal, who used the vast network of Gallic spies in preparing his daring crossing of the Alps (218 BCE), is one of the most striking examples. Those who overlooked intelligence often suffered devastating defeats. This is best exemplified by the total obliteration of three Roman legions in the battle of Teutoburg Forest (9 CE). The Roman army disregarded both combat intelligence and counterintelligence and was easily outmaneuvered by the forces led by a defector, which it failed to uncover and neutralize. Even Alexander the Great, the creator of one of the largest empires in history, relied heavily on clairvoyance. Ultimately, the whisperings of various charlatans led him to believe that he was the son of Zeus (Andrew 2018: 39).

Throughout history, intelligence services have played a crucial role in domestic politics. Rulers often relied on these services to spy on rivals and gauge public sentiment. Trusted couriers were essential for securely delivering secret messages, adhering to the 'eyes only' principle. Activities such as information gathering, espionage, cryptography, cryptanalysis, clandestine influence, and surveillance were conducted long before formal state institutions were established for these purposes. While the organizational structures and technologies have evolved, the primary objective has remained consistent: to rapidly and comprehensively acquire valuable intelligence.

During the early modern period, a systematic approach to understanding state institutions, including security apparatuses, began to emerge. This approach, known as Polizeiwissenschaft, eventually evolved into police science and, in part, intelligence studies. Identifying the first 'true' intelligence service is challenging, but Belgium's Sûreté Publique, established in 1830 and a precursor to today's State Security Service (VSSE), is one of the oldest still in operation. In the nineteenth century, many countries consolidated their secret political police forces. By the mid-century, German states were forming political police and counterintelligence units within their criminal police departments. In 1880, the Ottoman Empire established the Yıldız Intelligence Agency, which was succeeded by the Special Organization that later played a role in orchestrating the Armenian genocide. A year later, the tsarist Okhrana was created as a small unit within the main police force. Shortly thereafter, London's Metropolitan Police formed the Special Branch in 1883, and in colonial India, the Central Special Branch was established in 1887 as the first iteration of what is now the Intelligence Bureau.

The widespread rise of intelligence services in a shape similar to today's took place at the beginning of the twentieth century. It is when two famous intelligence services, considered to be one of the oldest, were established: British MI5 and MI6. In the beginning they were parts of one institution, the Secret Service Bureau, from which they branched out in 1914. In 1908, the US created the Bureau of Investigation, the predecessor of today's FBI, and in the same year, Romanians established Siguranța. WWII and the Cold War led to the flourishing of intelligence services. The world's political history is sometimes trivialized as endless competition for resources. If that is so, information continues to be one of the most treasured and sought-after goods.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Intelligence services (as well as LEAs) play such a big role in dictatorships, and the control of citizens' lives takes on such a large scale that they are often called 'police states,' which can be perceived as a definitional alternative for terms such as 'totalitarian,' 'fascist,' or 'authoritarian' (Seri 2013: 125; Tipton 2013: 13-16).

The main characteristics of intelligence services in dictatorships are (A) politicization, (B) dominating the security apparatus, (C) lack of accountability, (D) repressiveness, and (E) excessive size.

Politicization (A) refers to the distinctive relationship between intelligence services and power structures. This issue is complex because – unlike law enforcement – intelligence services are, by design and definition, inseparably linked with politicians and politics. After all, they are supposed to be the eyes and ears of decision-makers, the 'nation's first line of defense,' as the CIA puts it. As their task is to be the state's early warning system, they are expected to serve politicians, which means dealing with strictly political issues. Thus, when the politicization of intelligence services is called out in democracies, it is not about politics in general but rather current political rivalries – that is, involving services in political competition, using them to fight the legal opposition or to manipulate public opinion. In a dictatorship, however, there is no distinction between a state's general interests and the particular interests of those in power. They are considered to be the same thing, which makes the role of intelligence services all the greater.

In dictatorships, the functions and structures of intelligence services are, as compared to democracy, drastically expanded. The dictator needs it this way for two reasons: to spy on his own people and to spy on everyone else. Dictatorship's intelligence services lead the way in performing a diagnostic-preventive function (cf. police forces). Even the most trusted individuals have to take into account that their phone calls are wiretapped, and their correspondence goes through regular perlustration. In dictatorships, everyone at the top is systematically spying on each other. The goal of the intelligence agency carrying out the duties of political police is to be the dictatorship's most trustworthy channel of information, a tool designed for verifying the news and rumors that flow from the entire apparatus through the palace corridors, at once cleansing and corroding. Apart from Nazi and communist institutions, the Organization for Vigilance, and Repression of Anti-Fascism (OVRA), the secret police of Benito Mussolini's fascist regime (cf. Fascism), is a good example. Its possibilities were virtually endless. It ignored the law and formal structures, surveilling everyone, dissidents and fascists alike. Also, it had the power to influence the activities of other bodies, e.g., intervene in police investigations (Ebner 2011: 54).

Typically, the persons whom the dictator entrusts with authority over the intelligence apparatus automatically become some of the most influential figures in the state, regardless of their formal position. As the holders of the greatest secrets and the guardians of access to them, these overseers become widely recognized as some of the most prominent persons in the dictatorship, both by their political associates and by the public. Their knowledge, powers, and (often) accompanying crimes may seem endless. For a period, they may be considered omnipotent and impossible to be dislodged from their positions, but in a dictatorship, being the head of the secret service is usually a position with a short expiration date.

When a spymaster's position grows too much at the dictator's expense, he may find himself falling from grace. Many overambitious, traitorous, reckless or simply unlucky spymasters ended poorly, forced into retirement (Manuel Contreras in Pinochet's Chile), jailed (Ma Jian in China), shot (Nikolai Yezhov in the USSR) or hanged (Wilhelm Canaris in Nazi Germany). Even if they remain faithful and competent, the ever-changing internal balance of power may eventually bring them down. As soon as their patrons are gone, they quickly meet their downfall. After killing and tormenting people by the thousands, Lavrentiy Beria, once the second most powerful person in the USSR, was himself executed by his fellow comrades. His sovereign, Joseph Stalin, who died ten months earlier, could not protect him.

However, another issue is the fate of spymasters after the fall of the dictatorship. Manuel Contreras, who played a crucial role in the regime's systemic kidnapping, torture, and murder of thousands of civilians, was convicted of numerous human rights violations and was serving a 505-year prison sentence for crimes against humanity when he died in 2015. Also, Erich Mielke and Markus Wolf, who headed East Germany's Ministry for State Security, better known as Stasi) were held accountable, although not necessarily to the extent that corresponded to their crimes or that would satisfy the public. History is full of cases like the one of Matthias Warnig, another prominent Stasi officer, who moved to Russia after the fall of communism and got involved in building the Nord Stream gas pipeline.

Political figures may use competing security institutions to get 'in the loop' and to provide themselves with at least partial protection from surveillance. To this end, they may try to instrumentalize the age-old rivalry between civilian and military intelligence. Moreover, intelligence services, like any other bureaucratic structure, are not monoliths. Influential factions in the government, junta or a party are constantly trying to get access to the heart of the apparatus through trusted officers, which contributes to factionalism, political backstabbing and ever-changing alliances. Therefore, the everyday functioning of top-tier intelligence officers becomes inextricably linked with political intrigues at the heights of power, and a significant part of their resources are wasted on fictitious or artificially created palace intrigues. Continuous monitoring of the ambitions, conflicts, contacts and private lives of the elites becomes one of the most absorbing duties of intelligence services. The dictator takes advantage of this chaos, playing off his subjects on the principle of divida et impera. Motasem Abuzaid, who studied various intelligence networks in Syria and Iraq in the sixties and seventies, argued that intelligence agencies become instruments of conflict resolution, i.e., that they were being used "as tools for resolving internal elite disputes" (Abuzaid 2024).

The dictatorship's intelligence services are not only concerned with detecting (or fabricating) conspiracies at the top of politics but do the same thing at the very bottom. For example, while installing his New Order, the Indonesian authoritarian regime, Suharto made sure that intelligence would flow to him even from the provinces. The established territorial commands kept him up to date with information on any threat, even at the village level (Mufti Makarim 2021: 81). The key concept is the 'internal enemy:' vaguely defined and constantly reinvented by the propaganda. In a democratic regime, the limits of political policing are set by the constitution, freedom of speech and political pluralism, alongside specialized public administration structures responsible for oversight and control, but such restrictions do not exist in dictatorships.

The agencies of nondemocratic regimes tend to perceive all groups that are, for whatever reason, 'different' as a potential threat and thus worthy of monitoring. This includes, for example, youth subcultures. The actions of the Stasi are demonstrative. They even prepared an illustrated leaflet for their officers explaining who the metalheads, punks, and new romantics were, labeling them 'negative-decadent' (Stasi Mediathek). One may wonder what listening to The Cure has to do with national security, but it must be remembered that these subcultures were a product of Western counter-culture movements, which was more than enough to consider them suspicious by East German intelligence. Moreover, in the world of intelligence, no detail is too small, and even seemingly insignificant information may further the service's interests. Knowledge about someone's musical preferences may be useful in, for instance, a recruitment process or undercover work.

In non-democratic regimes, the extensive responsibilities of intelligence apparatuses often lead to staffing challenges. This creates a paradox: to maintain impermeable ranks, these services should avoid excessive expansion. As they grow larger, they risk becoming weaker. Finding enough suitable candidates is difficult, especially since social advancement, while beneficial for political police, does not address shortages in areas requiring specialized knowledge such as foreign, military, economic, and signals intelligence. Consequently, dictatorships often rely on cadres from the previous regime. Although trusting representatives of the ancien régime is challenging, replacing a counterintelligence officer is far more difficult than replacing a police officer due to the lengthy and costly training involved and the invaluable knowledge they possess. Therefore, ideological principles often take a backseat to effectiveness.

The same principles apply to the confidential human sources (HUMINT – 'Human Intelligence') of the ancien régime, often referred to as 'snitches,' 'rats,' 'informants,' or 'agents' – cf. Box 3.11) Although these individuals may have worked against the emerging dictatorship, the new regime's officials often resist the temptation to exact revenge. Even the most oppressive regimes recognize certain inviolable rules regarding HUMINT. For instance, after the Nazis took control of Germany in 1933, Heinrich Himmler and Reinhard Heydrich assumed command over the police in Munich. They became the superiors of Franz Meixner, who managed political intelligence in the region. Meixner later recounted how they pressured him to reveal informants who had reported on Nazi activities. He repeatedly refused, arguing that the agreement between a service and its informants is sacrosanct (Meixner 1965: 186-187). The short-term satisfaction of betraying this trust would lead to long-term intelligence failures, as few would be willing to cooperate with a regime known for breaking faith. While it is difficult to estimate how many agents from previous regimes are co-opted, it is evident that executing informants yields little benefit. Dictatorships are driven by ideology, but even ideological fervor has its limits.

With co-optation, past injustices of the previous regime are overlooked. This process is complex, as these services often symbolize the oppression of the old regime that is being overthrown. For example, after the Kingdom of Romania fell to communism in 1947, the infamous Securitate was established, largely built on the remnants of the pre-communist Siguranța rather than starting anew (Stan 2004: 343) using its reports and information for a new direction (Stan 2009: 131). Similarly, following the 1917 Russian Revolution, the Okhrana, a symbol of tsarist repression, was disbanded. While some of its headquarters were destroyed and leaders jailed, its functions were absorbed by the Cheka. Notably, some top-tier Okhrana officers fled and were recruited by Western services, while others joined the Cheka (Brackman 2001: 209). The Cheka benefited significantly from seizing Okhrana's files, gaining valuable techniques for their operations (Bagley 2007: 108). In Nazi Germany, the Gestapo incorporated not only most of the Weimar political police staff, all their files and card indexes, but also their informants (Mallmann 1997: 34).

Intelligence's longue durée can be illustrated by the career of Reinhard Gehlen, a military intelligence officer who served during both the Weimar Republic and Nazi Germany. After WWII, he was one of the founders and the first president of the Federal Intelligence Service (BND). In his memoirs, he recalled one of his meetings with Konrad Adenauer, the first chancellor of the FRG. "General, is there anybody you can still trust?" – asked the chancellor. Gehlen replied: "Where there is no trust, Chancellor, there can be no intelligence service. But we call it a 'watchful trust.'" (Gehlen 1972: 150). Under Gehlen, some former Nazis were welcomed into the service, with Karl Silberbauer, Anne Frank's captor, being one of the most known examples. It would be hard to read it as a part of the German concepts of 'dealing with the past' (Vergangenheitsbewältigung) or 'coming to terms with the past' (Vergangenheitsaufarbeitung).

Dominating the security apparatus (B) – This is a key characteristic in dictatorships: While the security system as a whole is crucial for establishing and maintaining a dictatorship, it is the political police that serves as its lifeblood. After a regime takeover, the de facto dominance of intelligence services becomes apparent, often relegating other security institutions to subordinate roles. The extent of this dominance varies by regime type. In military juntas, intelligence services are typically integrated with the military, whereas in civilian dictatorships, law enforcement often merges with the intelligence apparatus, which then becomes the leading entity. Border protection and the penitentiary system may also fall under their control to some degree.

This hierarchical structure can lead to internal conflicts, such as the rivalry between the 'civilian' RSHA and the military intelligence agency Abwehr in Nazi Germany. Dictatorships and their security apparatuses are not monolithic. Adolf Hitler was always suspicious of the Abwehr, which had served both the Reichswehr of the Weimar Republic and later the Wehrmacht of Nazi Germany, doubting its loyalty to the regime. In 1944, he dissolved it and subsumed its functions into the RSHA (Ausland-SD).

Due to the role of intelligence services, there are times when they have to tell political leaders what they do not want to hear. When the conclusions and recommendations of intelligence products diverge from already established political plans or ideological principles, they are often ignored. Some politicians anticipate products that will confirm their beliefs and intuitions, and when that does not happen, they are eager to ignore them and to 'shoot the messenger.' Ken Kotani (2009) noted this cognitive bias known as belief perseverance in Japanese intelligence in WWII. The ego of despots is particularly fragile, and personalist rulers are more likely to dismiss unwelcome reports, but the problem also occurs in democracies.

Greater importance, more prestige and higher salaries arouse reluctance and jealousy among police officers, as being transferred from the police force to the intelligence service is considered a promotion, not the other way around. This domination goes even beyond the security apparatus, infecting the justice system and the prosecutor's office. For example, as John Christian Schmeidel (2007: 40) points out, the Stasi "subsumed all criminal, and judicial organs that in the West are presumed to keep a healthy distance from one another. Officers of the criminal police, the Kripo [Kriminalpolizei], were either IMs [unofficial collaborators], Ministry officers themselves, or directly subordinate to them. Prosecutors, trial judges, sentencing tribunals, and prisons were answerable to the Stasi." One of the former officers of the Citizens' Militia, the main police force of communist Poland, assessed the political police as follows: "We didn't particularly like each other with our colleagues from the Security Service. We shared the nation's view on this, although our reasons for this reluctance were completely different. They thought they were better than us. Moreover, they were the only ones who performed an important service for the country, and what all of us could do is to lie down, fetch, and, when necessary, bark" (Nyzio 2020: 285).

An extreme example of the expansion of intelligence services and their assumption of other state functions is illustrated by their power to administer extrajudicial punishment. This is exemplified by the Special Council of the NKVD, which had the authority to sentence 'traitors of the Motherland' and their families (i.e., collective punishments) to labor camps based solely on investigative materials, without a trial. In 1942 alone, the Special Council sentenced nearly 47,000 people, compared to less than 22,000 sentenced by all general jurisdiction courts during the same period (Budnitskii & Hale-Dorrell 2019: 470).

Similarly, in communist Hungary, the State Protection Authority (ÁVH) absorbed numerous responsibilities from other institutions. As Peter Kenez (2022: 69) noted, the ÁVH oversaw border guards, prisons, foreign intelligence, and counterintelligence and even managed political reliability within the army. It also included a department to protect against 'economic crimes,' effectively transforming it into a ministry rather than merely a service. Such expansions highlight how intelligence services in authoritarian regimes often extend their influence beyond traditional boundaries, consolidating power and control across various state functions.

Non-political accountability (C), a crucial aspect of democratic states' security systems, is an alien concept for any dictatorship. Oversight and control over intelligence services in democracies are conducted by various entities, such as courts, prosecutor's offices, supreme audit institutions, ombudsman's offices, internal affairs divisions, civil society organizations, and parliamentary bodies. In dictatorships, these do not exist at all or are merely a façade. Naturally, public opinion is kept completely in the dark, except for official propaganda. Intelligence services themselves assume the role of censors and propaganda mouthpieces.

The formal powers of supervisory bodies and the letter and spirit of the law often hold little real significance. Consequently, researchers often overlook bodies like the State Duma Committee on Security and Corruption Control or the Federation Council Committee on Defense and Security in Russia, which nominally oversee security apparatus activities. It is widely understood that the true oversight lies elsewhere.

Dictatorships are generally unconcerned with legal provisions governing intelligence services, justifying their covert operations under the guise of 'national security.' Typically, they conduct these extralegal activities discreetly to maintain plausible deniability. However, in countries with a strong legal culture, efforts are made to at least give these actions an appearance of legality. For instance, the Gestapo operated within a framework that required a technical basis for all actions, even if it sharply contrasted with established legal traditions. This led to the creation of new laws to legitimize their practices (Bramstedt 2013: 160). The Nazis attempted to mask illegal activities with legal façades, such as forcing political opponents to sign documents stating they were detained at their own request.

Repressiveness (D) is a defining feature of dictatorships, extending beyond mere blackmail, threats of arrest, and discrediting to include mental manipulation and physical beatings. Intelligence services work in tandem with police forces to enforce harsh penal measures, but their activities often extend further to include kidnappings, systemic torture, medical experiments, and assassinations – often disguised as 'disappearances,' (unlikely) suicides or accidents (like the 'defenestrations' in Putin's Russia), or 'casual' murders by 'unknown perpetrators.' While some of these actions are not entirely unheard of in democratic countries, they are relatively rare. In dictatorships, however, especially during their establishment phases when remnants of the previous system are being eliminated, such acts become central duties of the political police. The NKVD/KGB and Gestapo committed notable atrocities, though they inspired imitators elsewhere. These 'additional activities' of secret services, which far exceed the traditional roles of intelligence, contribute significantly to the infamy of dictatorships. Daniela Richterova (2024) likened the State Security (StB) of communist Czechoslovakia to a 'Swiss Army knife,' highlighting its wide range of functions.

The National Intelligence and Security Authority (NISA) under Ferdinand Marcos in the Philippines (AMLC, 1976), Argentina's 601 Intelligence Battalion (Lessa 2022: 125, 294-295), Chile's DINA (Kornbluh 2016: 170-171), Japan's Kempeitai (Kratoska 1998: 115), and Cambodia's Khmer Rouge's Santebal 'keeper of the peace' unit (Chandler 1999: 130) are all infamous for their extreme torture techniques (cf. Box 7.6). (The references detail the scale of their terror (Box 3.13) and how they pioneered or innovated torture techniques).

Intelligence services in dictatorships are often integrated into these regimes' war machinery, participating in conquests and oppressing newly acquired territories. This is exemplified by the actions of the Nazis and Soviets but also extends to colonial empires. Owen Sirrs (2021) highlights that the legacy of extralegal surveillance, indefinite detention, torture, and 'disappearances' by the Portuguese political police, PIDE, during António de Oliveira Salazar's Estado Novo regime, persisted in Portugal's former African colonies of Mozambique and Angola. The influence of communist intelligence services from Cuba, the Soviet Union, and East Germany was even more pronounced (Sirrs 2021: 69).

Enormous size (E) – Combining mass surveillance, persecution and systemic torture, the sharp end of the judiciary, policing, special operations, etc., requires significant infrastructure and various resources, turning intelligence services of dictatorships into bureaucratic behemoths. They are usually several or even a dozen times larger than in democracies, both in terms of the size of their ranks and the number of assets they run.

One way to measure their scale is by estimating the number of collaborators in (historical) intelligence services. Romania's Securitate grew from 5,000 in 1950 to nearly 15,000 over four decades. In communist Poland, secret police numbers fluctuated, peaking at 35,000 in 1952 and reaching 25,000 with 100,000 informants by 1989. East Germany's Stasi had up to 180,000 collaborators and employed 75,000 to 91,000 people in the 1980s. Czechoslovakia's StB had up to 15,000 employees and 100,000 collaborators. North Korea had the highest internal security ratio at 1:124 (personal to population), with East Germany coming second (1:166). For comparison, the ratio for Chile in the early 1970s was 1:2,600 (Chestnut Greitens 2016: 9).

Russia has a long history in intelligence, with notable organizations such as the tsarist Oprichnina and Okhrana and the communist-era Cheka, OGPU, NKVD, NKGB, MVD, and the well-known KGB. The KGB's staff in 1991 was estimated at around 720,000, including 230,000 border protection troops (Hilger 2010: 85). In Russia, military intelligence services often play significant roles beyond defense. Currently, Vladimir Putin's regime relies on the Federal Security Service (FSB), the Main Directorate of the General Staff (GRU, now GU), and the Foreign Intelligence Service (SVR). Soldatov and Borogan (2010: 80) note that key data on these services are undisclosed; however, estimates suggest the FSB employs over 200,000 people. A recent source finds that approximately 350,000 serve in the FSB (including over 200,000 in its Border Service), about 37,000 in the GU (with around 25,000 Spetsnaz), and at least 15,000 in the SVR (BMI 2023: 311-312).

Among dictatorships, communist China has one of the largest intelligence apparatuses in the world, both internal and external. Similar to the services of post-Soviet dictatorships, the boundaries between Chinese counterintelligence, foreign intelligence and law enforcement are blurred (Mattis 2012). Remarkably, little is known about the main component of the apparatus, the Ministry of State Security (MSS). Nigel Inkster (2019), the former assistant chief and director of operations and intelligence of the MI6 and expert on China, assesses that: "The overall number of MSS cadre officers is likely to be in the region of 100,000 with up to 40,000 deployed overseas, and the remainder within China." (Inkster 2019: 200).

Some intelligence services that are empowered with investigative (i.e., police) functions have tactical (counter-terrorist) units as well, which are being used to detain individuals identified as posing a threat. However, for most, it is rather unheard of to possess special operation units. For Russia, however, it is a long-standing tradition. The most notorious example is the previously mentioned Spetsnaz, special forces of military intelligence service GU (until 2010 GRU). Although Spetsnaz is involved in conducting classical espionage, it is primarily known for acts of terrorism, diversion and partisan operations (Suvorov 1991: 10-16). Similarly, Spetsgruppa A (Alpha) operates within the FSB, carrying on the tradition of Osnaz, special forces of the Cheka, NKVD and KGB. In line with this custom, the Belarusian State Security Committee (KGB RB), the successor to the KGB of the Belorussian Soviet Socialist Republic, has its 'special purpose' unit as well. (For more on Belarus, consult Usov 2023).

Russia's intelligence services are notorious for alleged extrajudicial killings and assassinations, a practice that persists post-Cold War (Volodarsky 2020: 240-247). Although the KGB no longer exists, its mindset endures in its successors. Robert Baer (2022: vii) noted, "The KGB is a way of thinking as much as it is an organization." This is evident in the suspicious deaths of many of Putin's opponents. The 1999 Russian apartment bombings, which killed over 300 people, are widely believed to have been orchestrated by the FSB and GRU to justify the Second Chechen War and boost Putin's popularity. Alexander Litvinenko, a former FSB officer who defected to London, claimed the bombings were an inside job and co-authored Blowing up Russia on the topic (Felshtinsky & Litvinenko 2007). He was later fatally poisoned with polonium-210.

Dictatorship secret services do not need to rely solely on physical abuse or forced confessions to oppress their citizens. They have access to a range of administrative measures, such as job dismissal, expulsion from educational institutions, and denial of passports. In efforts to control and recruit individuals, they often use blackmail, supported by compromising materials known as kompromat (Box 8.3). James P. Choy, who studied 'kompromat regimes,' noted that modern autocratic regimes maintain power not through overt force but by manipulating public opinion via sensationalist media and systematic blackmail (Choy 2020: 12). Coercion is not always the most effective method; other motivators include financial or sexual incentives, power dynamics, or ideological alignment. These are collectively referred to as SMICE motivators (sex, money, ideology, compromise/coercion, ego).

LITERATURE To understand the origins, nature, and evolution of intelligence services, several key works are invaluable. These include studies on historical contexts like Information Gathering in Classical Greece (Russell 1999) and Intelligence Activities in Ancient Rome (Sheldon 2004), as well as explorations of specific systems such as Venice's Secret Service (Iordanou 2019). Broad, cross-sectional analyses like The Secret World (Andrew 2018) provide foundational insights, while comparative perspectives are offered by Johnson 2010; Williams & Deletant 2001 and Caparini 2014 (for Eastern Europe and the Balkans). Additionally, books such as The Ethics of Intelligence (Bellaby 2014) and The Regulation of Intelligence Activities under International Law (Duroy 2023) or Leviathan's Heirs (Warner 2022) examine the ethical and legal dimensions and legacies of intelligence, respectively. A synthesis of the changing functions can be found in Intelligence in an Insecure World (Gill & Phythian 2018).

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES While the concept of 'democratic policing' is legitimate albeit problematic (Fu & Chen 2023: 5-8), the idea of 'democratic intelligence' is, according to Gill & Phythian (2018: 154), 'as oxymoronic as military music.' Intelligence services operate in the shadows, and this must remain so. Even in the model democratic countries, security institutions are characterized by limited transparency and eagerness to hide behind the comfortable 'national security' clause, refusing to disclose even trivial information. Conducting in-depth research on contemporary intelligence services will most likely prove to be a far more challenging undertaking than studying existing LEAs. Sometimes, archival documents from the quite recent past, such as intelligence reports, are being declassified and made available to the public, but this is hardly a well-established practice. Declassified or leaked documents are particularly cognitively valuable but often too incomplete, too scarce and too circumstantial to treat them as fully representative and ultimately conclusive. Obviously, it is an even more demanding endeavor when it comes to existing dictatorships. The general information is often available, but the lack of possibility to 'look inside' the institution often makes it impossible to conduct more exhaustive studies and limits scientific inquiries to scratching the surface. Naturally, even working with open data, it is possible to conduct interesting research on tightly sealed apparatuses, as demonstrated by the study of the Iranian case conducted by Carl Anthony Wege (1997). However, investigating historical cases opens up more possibilities. The fall of a 'police state' is often associated with the opening of at least some of its archives, which paves the way for substantial research. This too, however, is paved with obstacles (see also police forces for shared 'methodological issues').

The legacy of fallen dictatorships and their secret services is complex, involving dysfunctional intelligence practices, public distrust, and sensitive archival materials. These archives contain personal details of officers and sources, as well as the operational methods of the services, which evolve rather than undergo revolutionary change. The dilemma of handling these archives stems from fears of political scandal and unrest, while intelligence services aim to protect their secrets (cf. lustration in Box 3.7).

Different countries have adopted varied approaches to these archival issues. After the Berlin Wall fell, East Germany's secret police files were quickly opened, leading to the establishment of the Stasi Records Agency (the 'Gauck agency') for processing the past. Conversely, Latvia initially restricted access to KGB archives until 2018, when they were gradually made public, revealing shocking names of secret collaborators. In Finland, the Tiitinen list – named after Seppo Tiitinen, head of the Finnish Security and Intelligence Service (SUPO) – containing names of Finns suspected of Stasi contacts remains classified until 2050 despite ongoing controversy (Martelius & Pietiläinen 2024).

In some cases, post-dictatorship archives have proven less sensational than anticipated. In Poland, a restricted collection managed by the Institute of National Remembrance was opened in 2017 but contained nothing groundbreaking. Even when archives are underwhelming, they hold significance for intelligence scholars. Ethical and methodological challenges arise from incomplete and misleading records. Intelligence services often engage in deception and self-deception, complicating historical analysis. Malcolm Muggeridge, a journalist who joined the British Intelligence Corps during World War II, famously remarked on the unreliability of such records: "Diplomats and intelligence agents (…) are even bigger liars than journalists, and the historians who try to construct the past out of their records are, for the most part, dealing in fantasy." (Muggeridge 1973: 149). It is a focal methodological warning to treat intelligence services' historical accounts in accordance with the even more famous Russian proverb: "Trust, but verify."

Finding ways to capture the essence of intelligence transformation comprehensively is one of the most interesting research areas, as well as methodological challenges. The optimal, but also the most difficult, way is to adopt a very broad approach, combining law, political science, sociology, cultural studies, psychology, and history, and to conduct international comparative research. A strong theoretical framework is needed, of which convincing attempts can already be found in the literature. An example is the work of Sofia Tzamarelou (2024: 11-35) on the cases of Portugal, Greece and Spain. She presents the criteria based on which 'intelligence democratization' can be measured, including its key indicators, which involve lustration (Box 3.7), control and oversight, recruitment, targeting, and civil society.

As societies transition from authoritarian regimes, they grapple with the legacy of repressive intelligence services that felt omnipotent. These services, once integral to maintaining the power of dictatorships, face significant institutional challenges as they adapt to a democratic political order.

In many cases, the continuity of personnel and practices from the previous regimes complicates reform efforts. (Watts 2001: 21) For instance, in Brazil and Greece, the transition to democracy involved attempts to demilitarize and democratize intelligence services that had been heavily militarized (Stepan 1988: 13; Braat 2024: 861). Conversely, South Africa's transition from Apartheid (Box 4.7) saw more successful reforms. The country's intelligence services were transformed to align with democratic principles, although this process was iterative and closely tied to broader democratization efforts (Segell 2021: 73-74). Similarly, Spain's transition involved significant reforms under Emilio Alonso Manglano, who found the intelligence apparatus in a deplorable state (militarized, backward, closed to the outside world) but gradually modernized it post-Franco (Fernández Miranda & Chicote Lerena 2024: 43).

The complexity of reform is evident in Portugal, Japan, and the Baltic States. When the Carnation Revolution of 1974 (Box 6.4) brought down the Portuguese dictatorship Estado Novo, the only regime's bastion that put up armed resistance was the headquarters of the political police – the General Directorate of Security (DGS), a successor of PIDE. The Portuguese were so radical in their resentment toward political police that for years, they refused to build a new civilian intelligence apparatus, deciding to leave this matter in the hands of the military (Tzamarelou 2024: 135). After WWII, Japan's intelligence services were disbanded under Allied occupation, leading to a fragmented intelligence apparatus supervised by the National Police Agency (NPA), whose role expanded over time, but the country still faces issues of compartmentalization and lacks a unified foreign intelligence service (Soo 2024; Sieg & Kubo 2015). The Baltic States, despite claims of building from scratch, faced challenges in staffing new institutions after the collapse of the USSR (Watts 2004; Česnuliavičius & Visockas 2007).

In other countries, however, policies in this area are minimal, and post-Francoist Spain became known for adopting a radically different approach: the 'Pact of Forgetting,' established 1975-1977 (but this was undermined in 2006 when the so-called Historical Memory Law was adopted). Ukraine's intelligence apparatus allegedly "inherited all of the Ukrainian KGB's personnel" (Fluri & Polyakov 2021). Hugyik (2021: 41) found that the regime change in Hungary had no huge impact on the military services.

Public debates on the continuity of personnel and practices persist, as seen in Poland's discussions on pensions for former communist officers (Kujawa 2016). For the Greek case, see Ετήσια Έκθεση (2023) and Mandravelis (2024); for Slovakia, Romania, and the Czech Republic, consult Williams 2001; Deletant 2001.

Andrew & Dilks (1984) argue that intelligence services play a critical yet often overlooked role in global affairs. At the same time it is vital not to overestimate the power of dictatorships' political police. Historical myths about the omnipotence of secret police often stem from propaganda or post-dictatorship narratives shaped by former dissidents. These myths can distort perceptions of agencies' actual capabilities and influence. This is best exemplified by studies on the East German Stasi conducted by Mallmann & Paul (1994) and on PIDE (Portugal) conducted by Simpson & Louceiro (2021). To understand these agencies fully and hold them accountable, researchers must approach each case individually, acknowledging the diversity within repressive institutions and avoiding sweeping generalizations.

NEW FRONTIERS As shown above, the transition from dictatorship to democracy often involves complex challenges in reforming intelligence services, which are deeply intertwined with transitional justice and public trust. All regimes co-opt institutions from their predecessor because their information is so valuable and sensitive; dictatorships do so without blushing, and democratic successor regimes are unable to forgo some continuity of personnel and practices, even if this brings with its own set of challenges, such as balancing national security needs with civil liberties (e.g., data collection) with demands for civilian oversight while burdened with an authoritarian legacy and systemic public distrust. Improving control and oversight of intelligence remains a central challenge for democracies; for a supervisory system to be effective, appropriate legal conditions must be met. Born et al. (2005) argue that without legal powers, financial resources, and staff, an oversight body is deemed to be a 'toothless' institution, no match for a government or its intelligence services (Gill & Phythian 2018; Born & Leigh 2007).

Regarding the contemporary challenges of intelligence services, consult Wagner (2022) for the ongoing 'arms race' concerning surveillance systems and corresponding countermeasures (cf. cyber-warfare) and how democracies are to respond to that (Vitkauskas 1999; Bellaby 2014); Thuillier (2023) for its mission creep under the cover of terrorist threat: Raphael & Blakeley (2016) and Schmidt (2018) on the misconduct of democracies in combating terrorism; Keefe (2010) for private non-state intelligence agencies; Ghioni et al. (2023) on the abundance of available data in the age of technology and the use of 'open source intelligence' (OSINT) and the limits to state's intrusion into interpersonal communication in democracies (Walton 2021). For this clandestine ecosystem, the next adaptation is likely the harnessing of AI for secret intelligence (cf. Ghioni et al. 2023), although currently only a few states, mainly global powers, possess sufficiently developed intelligence apparatuses to face up to this challenge truly.

How to cite:

Nyzio, Arkadiusz, 2025. Intelligence Services in Dictatorships, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Abuzaid, M., 2024. The Blueprint of a Durable Ba'th: Sequencing Intelligence Dominance in Syria and Iraq, 1968-1979. Paper presented at the conference 'Knock in the Night. Intelligence, Security and Special Services in Authoritarian States,' Brunel Centre for Intelligence and Security Studies.

Andrew, C., 2018. The secret world: a history of intelligence. Yale University Press.

Andrew, C. and Dilks, D., 1984. Introduction. In The Missing Dimension Governments and Intelligence Communities in the Twentieth Century. Andrew, A. and Dilks D., eds., Palgrave Macmillan.

AMLC, 1976. Political detainees in the Philippines: documentation report of Signs of the Times, a publication of the Association of Major Religious Superiors in the Philippines, Anti-Martial Law Coalition (Philippines).

Baer, R., 2022. The Fourth Man: The Hunt for a KGB Spy at the Top of the CIA and the Rise of Putin's Russia. Hachette UK.

Bagley, T.H., 2007. Spy Wars: Moles, Mysteries, and Deadly Games. Yale University Press.

Bellaby, R.W., 2014. The ethics of intelligence. A new framework. Routledge.

Born, H., and Leigh I., 2007. Democratic accountability of intelligence services. Geneva Centre for the Democratic Control of Armed Forces.

Braat, E., 2024. Democratization of Intelligence: Demilitarizing the Greek Intelligence Service after the Junta. International Journal of Intelligence and CounterIntelligence, 37.

Brackman, R., 2001. The Secret File of Joseph Stalin: A Hidden Life. Frank Cass.

Bramstedt, E.K., 2013. Dictatorship and political police: the technique of control by fear, Routledge.

Budnitskii, O. and Hale-Dorrell, A., 2019. The Great Terror of 1941: toward a history of wartime Stalinist criminal justice. Kritika: Explorations in Russian and Eurasian History, 20:3.

Caparini, M., 2014. Comparing the democratization of intelligence governance in East Central Europe and the Balkans. Intelligence and National Security, 29.4.

Česnulevičius, V. and Visockas, G., 2007. Sąžiningi žvalgybininkai valstybei vis dar nereikalingi?, „XXI amžiaus" priedas apie slaptąsias tarnybas.

Chandler, D., 1999. Voices from S-21 Terror and History in Pol Pot's Secret Prison. University of California Press.

Chen W. and Fu, H., 2023. Mapping the Authoritarian and Democratic Divide. The Transformation of Policing in Asia, In Regime Type and Beyond: The Transformation of Police in Asia. Cambridge University Press.

Choy, J.P., 2020. Kompromat: A theory of blackmail as a system of governance. Journal of Development Economics, 147.

Christopher, A., 2018. The Secret World. A History of Intelligence. Yale University Press.

BMI, 2023. Verfassungsschutzbericht 2022. Das Bundesministerium des Innern und für Heimat.

Deletant, D., 1993. The Securitate and the Police State in Romania: 1948-64. Intelligence and National Security, 8:4.

Deletant, D., 2001. The Successors to the Securitate: Old Habits Die Hard. In Security Intelligence Services in New Democracies: The Czech Republic, Slovakia and Romania. Palgrave in association with the School of Slavonic and East European Studies.

Duroy, S., 2023. The regulation of intelligence activities under international law, Edward Elgar Publishing.

Ebner, M.R., 2011. Ordinary Violence in Mussolini's Italy, Cambridge University Press.

Felshtinsky, Y., and Litvinenko, A., 2007. Blowing up Russia: acts of terror, abductions, and contract killings organized by the Federal Security Service of the Russian Federation, Gibson Square.

Fernández Miranda, J. and Chicote Lerena, J., 2024. El Jefe de Los Espías. Rocabolsillo.

Fluri, P. and Polyakov, L., 2021. Intelligence and Security Services Reform and Oversight in Ukraine. An Interim Report. Connections, 20:1.

Gehlen, R., 1972. The Service. The Memoirs of General Reinhard Gehlen, (Trans. by Irving, D. Introduction by G. Bailey), World Publishing, Times Mirror.

Ghioni, R., Taddeo M., and Floridi, L. 2023. Open source intelligence and AI: a systematic review of the GELSI literature. AI & Society.

Gieseke J., 2010. Niemiecka Republika Demokratyczna. In Czekiści: organy bezpieczeństwa w europejskich krajach bloku sowieckiego 1944-1989. Instytut Pamięci Narodowej.

Gill, P., 2010. Theories of Intelligence. In The Oxford Handbook of National Security Intelligence. Oxford University Press.

Gill, P. and Phythian, M., 2018. Intelligence in an insecure world. John Wiley & Sons.

Greitens, S.C., 2016. Dictators and their Secret Police: Coercive Institutions and State Violence, Cambridge University Press.
Higgins, A., 2019. 4,141 Latvians Were Just Outed as K.G.B. Informants. The New York Times.
Hilger, A., 2010. Związek Sowiecki 1945-1991. In Czekiści: organy bezpieczeństwa w europejskich krajach bloku sowieckiego 1944-1989. Instytut Pamięci Narodowej.
Hugyik, A., 2021. Lessons Learned from Military Intelligence Services Reform in Hungary. Connections, 20:1.
Inkster, N., 2019. The Chinese intelligence service. In The Routledge International Handbook of Universities, Security and Intelligence Studies. Routledge.
Iordanou, I., 2019. Venice's Secret Service: Organizing Intelligence in the Renaissance. Oxford University Press.
Jervis, R., 2007. Foreword. Intelligence, civil-intelligence relations, and democracy, In Reforming intelligence: obstacles to democratic control and effectiveness, Bruneau, T.C. and Boraz, S.C., eds., University of Texas Press.
Johnson, L., Born, H. and Leigh, I.D., 2005. Who's watching the spies? Establishing Intelligence Service accountability. Potomac Books.
Joyce, P. and Wain, N., 2014. Palgrave Dictionary of Public Order Policing, Protest and Political Violence. Palgrave Macmillan.
Keefe, P.R., 2010. Privatized Spying: The Emerging Intelligence Industry. In The Oxford Handbook of National Security Intelligence. Oxford University Press.
Kenez, P., 2022. Before the Uprising: Hungary under Communism, 1949-1956. Cambridge University Press.
Kornbluh, P., 2016. The Pinochet File: A declassified dossier on atrocity and accountability. The New Press.
Kotani, K., 2009. Japanese Intelligence in World War II. London.
Kratoska, P.H., 1998. The Japanese occupation of Malaya: A social and economic history. Hurs & Company.
Kujawa, R., 2016. Wierna służba oficera. Rzeczpospolita, 20:12.
Lessa, F., 2022. The Condor Trials: Transnational Repression and Human Rights in South America. Yale University Press.
Mallmann, K.-M., 1997. Social Penetration and Police Action: Collaboration Structures in the Repertory of Gestapo Activities. International Review of Social History, 42:1.
Mallmann, K.-M., Paul, G. 1994. "Omniscient, Omnipotent, Omnipresent? Gestapo, Society and Resistance," in Nazism and German Society, 1933-1945, Crew, D.R., ed. Routledge.
Mandravelis, P., 2024. Ποιος κυβερνάει την ΕΥΠ. Kathimerini.
Martelius, J. and Pietiläinen, T., 2024. Supon uusi päällikkö: Suomen alueiden eriytymisestä saatava nykyistä parempi kuv. The Helsingin Sanomat.
Mazzola, S., 2022. Intelligence Services in post conflict state building: a comprehensive study of Iraq and Afghanistan. King's College London.
Meixner, F., 1965. Kriminaltaktik. Verlag für kriminalistische Fachliteratur.
Mufti Makarim, A., 2021. Indonesian Intelligence Reform: Recent Challenges and Opportunities for Encouraging Democratic and Professional Intelligence. Connections, 20:1.
Muggeridge, M., 1973. Chronicles of Wasted Time. Part 2: The Infernal Grove. William Collins Sons & Co Ltd. London.
Nyzio, A., 2020. Rakowiecka w remoncie: transformacja polityki bezpieczeństwa wewnętrznego Polski w latach 1989-1993. Księgarnia Akademicka.
Omand, D. and Phythian, M., 2018. Principled spying: The ethics of secret intelligence, Oxford University Press.
Raphael, S. and Blakeley, R., 2016. Rendition in the 'War on Terror.' In Routledge Handbook of Critical Terrorism Studies. Routledge.
Richterova, D., 2024. Rethinking the Power and Status of the Communist Secret State: The Case of Czechoslovakia. Paper presented at the conference 'Knock in the Night. Intelligence, Security and Special Services in Authoritarian States,' Brunel Centre for Intelligence and Security Studies.
Russell, F.S., 1999. Information gathering in classical Greece, University of Michigan Press.
Schmeidel, J.C., 2007. Stasi: Shield and Sword of the Party, Routledge.
Schmidt, A. and Sikkink, K., 2018. Partners in Crime: An Empirical Evaluation of the CIA Rendition, Detention, and Interrogation Program. Perspectives on Politics, 16:4.
Segell, G., 2021. Infogate Influences on Reforms of South Africa's Intelligence Services. Connections, 20:1.
Seri, G., 2013. Seguridad: Crime, Police Power, and Democracy in Argentina, Bloomsbury.
Sheldon, R.M., 2004. Intelligence Activities in Ancient Rome: Trust in the Gods but Verify, Routledge.
Sieg, L. and Kubo, N., 2015. Japan eyes MI6-style spy agency as it seeks to shed pacifist past. Reuters.
Simpson, D. and Louceiro, A., 2021. Everyday Life under the PIDE. A Quantitative Survey on the Relations Between Ordinary Citizens and Salazar's Political Police (1955-74). International Journal of Iberian Studies, 34:3.
Sirrs, O., 2021. Soviet Bloc Security Services and the Birth of New Intelligence Communities in Mozambique and Angola. In African Intelligence Services: Early Postcolonial and Contemporary Challenges. Rowman & Littlefield.
Soldatov, A. and Borogan, I., 2010. Russia's New Nobility-The Rise of the Security Services in Putin's Kremlin. Foreign Affairs, 89:5.
Soo, M., 2024. Challenges of post-World War II Japanese intelligence reforms. Paper presented at the conference 'Knock in the Night. Intelligence, Security and Special Services in Authoritarian States,' Brunel Centre for Intelligence and Security Studies.
Stan, L., 2004. Spies, files and lies: explaining the failure of access to Securitate files. Communist and Post-Communist Studies, 37:3.
Stan, L., 2009. Romania. In Transitional Justice in Eastern Europe and the Former Soviet Union: Reckoning with the Communist Past. Routledge.
Stasi Mediathek, Erscheinungsformen 'negativ-dekadenter' Jugendlicher.
Stepan, A.C., 1988. Rethinking Military Politics: Brazil and the Southern Cone, Princeton University Press.
Suvorov, V., 1991. Specnaz. Historia sowieckich służb specjalnych. Wydawnictwo Wolny Wybór.
Thuillier, F., 2023. Liberty, equality, and counter-terrorism in France. In Intelligence Oversight in Times of Transnational Impunity: Who Will Watch the Watchers? Taylor & Francis.
Tipton, E.K., 2013. The Japanese Police State Tokko in Interwar Japan, Bloomsbury Publishing.
Tzamarelou, S., 2024. Intelligence in Democratic Transitions. A Comparative Analysis of Portugal, Greece, and Spain. Georgetown University Press.
Usov, P., 2023. From Authoritarianism to Neo-Totalitarianism in Belarus. In Politics and Security of Central and Eastern Europe. Contemporary Challenges. Springer.
Vis, T., 2012. Intelligence, politie en veiligheidsdienst: verenigbare grootheden? Tilburg University Research Portal.
Vitkauskas, D., 1999. The role of a security intelligence service in a democracy, NATO.
Volodarsky, B., 2020. Assassins: The KGB's Poison Factory Ten Years On. Frontline Books.

Wagner, I., 2022. Auditing Corporate Surveillance Systems: Research Methods for Greater Transparency. Cambridge University Press.
Walton, C., 2021. Spying on Americans: US Intelligence, Race Protests, and Dissident Movements: An Applied History Analysis. Journal of Applied History, 3:1-2.
Warner, M., 2022. Leviathan's Heirs: sovereignty, intelligence, and the modern state. Intelligence and National Security, 37.6.
Watts, L.L., 2001. Intelligence reform in Europe's emerging democracies. Studies in Intelligence, 48:1.
Wege, C.A., 1997. Iranian intelligence organizations. International Journal of Intelligence and CounterIntelligence, 10:3.
Wildt, M., 2002. Generation of the Unbound. The Leadership Corps of the Reich Security Main Office. Yad Vashem.
Williams, K. and Deletant, D., 2001. Security Intelligence Services in New Democracies. The Cases of Czech Republic, Slovakia and Romania. Palgrave.
Ετήσια Έκθεση 2023. Ετήσια Έκθεση Προτεραιοτήτων και Τομέων Δράσης της Εθνικής Υπηρεσίας Πληροφοριών.

Box 8.3 Kompromat – Blackmail

If you've got them by the balls, their hearts and minds will follow.
– White House saying

Kompromat (компромат) is a term used to describe compromising material or information that can be used to blackmail or influence someone, particularly in politics or business. The term is of Russian origin and is a combination of the words 'компрометирующий материал' – 'komprometiruyushchii' (compromising) and 'material' (material or information). The term is often associated with Russian intelligence practices, where the gathering and dissemination of kompromat is seen as a standard tool of statecraft. Kompromat can take many forms, including secretly recorded videos, photographs, documents, or other evidence that may be used to discredit or damage someone's reputation, career, or personal life. The release of kompromat is often timed strategically to cause maximum damage or embarrassment to the target.

Main contributions on studying kompromat are Ledeneva (2006), who investigates kompromat in Russia; Pearce (2015), who innovatively applies the concept to Azerbaijan; Surowiec (2017), who focuses on kompromat in Russia's hybrid warfare and propaganda; and Choy (2020), who attempts its theoretical generalization.

An example of the usage of kompromat is the case of Azerbaijani investigative journalist and human rights activist Khadija Ismailova. In 2012, Ismayilova published a series of articles that exposed corruption and abuses of power within the Azerbaijani government, above all business dealings of Azerbaijan's ruling family, including President Ilham Aliyev and his wife Mehriban Aliyeva. The articles revealed that the family had amassed a vast personal fortune through corruption and abuse of power. Ismayilova had to challenge a number of compromising materials, including a leaked video showing her in an intimate situation with her partner. In 2014, Ismayilova was arrested on trumped-up charges of inciting a former colleague to attempt suicide, and later on charges of tax evasion and abuse of power. She was held in pre-trial detention for several months before being sentenced to seven and a half years in prison in September 2015. Ismayilova's arrest and imprisonment were widely condemned by human rights organizations and the international community, who saw it as retaliation for her investigative reporting. She was released from prison in 2016 after serving more than a year and a half, following a global campaign for her release. Ismayilova continues to work as a journalist and human rights activist, despite facing ongoing harassment and intimidation from the Azerbaijani authorities. For more on Ismayilova's case, see e.g., Jurik (2021) and Voorhoof (2019).

How to cite:

Kopeček, Vincenc, 2025. Kompromat – Blackmail, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Choy, J.P., 2020. Kompromat: A Theory of Blackmail as a System of Governance. Journal of Development Economics, 147.
Jurik, B., 2021. The Right to Respect for a Journalist's Private Life: Combined Analysis of Articles 8 and 10 of the Convention. Case Khadija Ismayilova v. Azerbaijan. In The Rule of Law in Europe: Recent Challenges and Judicial Responses, Elósegui, M., Miron, A. and Motoc, I., eds., Springer.
Ledeneva, A.V., 2006. How Russia Really Works: The Informal Practices That Shaped Post-Soviet Politics and Business. Cornell University Press.
Pearce, K.E., 2015. Democratizing Kompromat: The Affordances of Social Media for State-Sponsored Harassment. Information, Communication & Society, 18:10.
Surowiec, P., 2017. Post-Truth Soft Power: Changing Facets of Propaganda, Kompromat, and Democracy. Georgetown Journal of International Affairs, 18:3.
Voorhoof, D., 2019. European Court of Human Rights: Khadija Ismayilova v. Azerbaijan. IRIS, 3.

Judiciaries in Authoritarian Regimes

Justice is blind, but judges have eyes.
– Matshona Dhliwayo, Zimbabwean-Canadian philosopher

Authoritarian regimes have adopted a number of nominally democratic institutions, including constitutions envisioning the separation of powers. While in democracies, judiciaries should be independent on both executive and legislative and act as institutions that interpret and apply the law, ensure justice, and uphold the rule of law, in authoritarian regimes, their role is more ambiguous – often tools of the regime, but not always.

DEFINITION Judiciaries exist both in democracies and authoritarian regimes. However, there is a significant difference in how the laws are applied and interpreted in both systems. In democracies, the principle of the rule of law stipulates that everyone, including government officials and the state itself, is subject to and accountable under the law. In authoritarian regimes, the principle of the rule of law is typically replaced by what is called rule by law. This implies that the state and governmental policies are based on laws, but genuine separation of powers is weakened or missing. This implies that while judiciaries in authoritarian regimes are formal institutions that nominally apply and interpret the law, they also perform different functions than their democratic counterparts, from serving as "institutions of repression" to "sites of active resistance" (Moustafa 2014: 282).

SEE ALSO This entry takes a closer look at the role of informality in various types of institutions in dictatorships, see also legislatures and bureaucracies. A related entry is authoritarian constitutionalism, explaining how courts are used to subvert the ideas of constitutionalism and manipulate them to prolong or deepen authoritarian control, espousing legitimacy derived by (non-democratic) legal-rational rule (cf. Max Weber).

KEY SIGNIFICANCE In conventional wisdom, judiciaries in authoritarian regimes are frequently seen as mere pawns in the hands of a dictator and typically described using metaphors such as 'kangaroo courts' or 'telephone justice' (Moustafa 2014: 282). However, these metaphors provide a very limited view of the rather diverse and complex role of judiciaries in authoritarian regimes.

For example, Aquilar Férnandez and Ríos Figueroa (2014) – following M. Svolik – argue that authoritarian leaders use judicial institutions to deal with two fundamental problems: authoritarian control and authoritarian power-sharing. These judicial institutions may include prosecutors, judges, and courts. Other authors, such as Moustafa (2014) and Ginsburg & Moustafa (2008), identify a number of possible roles judiciaries can play in authoritarian regimes. They can be summarized as follows: (i) judiciaries exercise state power vis-à-vis opposition, they establish social control and sideline political opponents; (ii) judiciaries advance administrative discipline within state institutions and solve coordination problems among competing factions within the regime; (iii) judiciaries maintain cohesion among various factions within the ruling coalition; (iv) judiciaries facilitate market transitions; (v) judiciaries contain majoritarian institutions through authoritarian enclaves; (vi) judiciaries can implement controversial policies and reforms so as to allow political distance from core elements of the regime; (vii) judiciaries can bolster regime legitimacy.

ORIGIN In his groundbreaking work on authoritarian regimes, J.J. Linz (1964: 225) described authoritarianism as a regime where power is exercised "within formally ill-defined limits but actually quite predictable ones." This observation by Linz is also very telling in terms of understanding judiciaries in authoritarian regimes. Judiciaries are formally defined, but either the way how they are formally defined contradicts their independence from the executive, or their definition is relatively vague and provides many opportunities for informal practices and networks to influence judicial independence and objectivity.

However, for several decades, research on authoritarian regimes had largely ignored judiciaries; at the turn of the twentieth and twenty-first century, several authors (Barros 2002; Solomon 1996) demonstrated that the empirical reality in many authoritarian and even totalitarian countries contradicts popular wisdom. While the role of courts in selected authoritarian countries has been studied since at least the 1970s (Toharia 1975), a groundbreaking work in this regard was a volume edited by Ginsburg & Moustafa (2008), which brought together studies analyzing the role of judiciaries in a number of contemporary authoritarian and hybrid regimes mainly in Latin America, but also in Zimbabwe, Uganda, Egypt, China, Russia, Iran, and Turkey.

LITERATURE The volume edited by Moustafa & Ginsburg (2008) provides an excellent overview of existing theoretical approaches to the study of judiciaries in authoritarian regimes, as well as a careful selection of case studies from different continents. The monograph by Hilbink (2007) provides a concise theoretical account of the role of the judiciary in democracy and dictatorship and proceeds with a comprehensive analysis of Chile under and after Pinochet. More recent theoretical contributions were provided by Moustafa (2014) and Kureshi (2021).

CLASSIFICATIONS One of a few typologies of judiciaries in authoritarian regimes is provided by Kureshi (2021), who focuses on judicial relationships with authoritarian regimes. On the basis of two binary variables (normative and utilitarian interlinkages), he identified four types of courts: loyal, controlled, collaborative, and competitive.

MEASUREMENT Several composite indices measure the rule of law, such as the Rule of Law Indicator, one of the Worldwide Governance Indicators provided by the World Bank (Kaufmann & Kraay 2023), or the Rule of Law Index provided by the Global Change Data Lab. Regionally focused dataset Nations in Transit by Freedom House provides an indicator of 'Judicial Framework and Independence' in post-communist Eurasia.

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES Studying judiciaries in authoritarian regimes presents several methodological challenges stemming from limited transparency, political constraints, and lack of data. To address these methodological challenges, researchers studying judiciaries in authoritarian regimes often adopt a combination of approaches, including interviews with anonymous informants, analysis of legal documents, and triangulation of data from various sources (such as composite indices) to enhance the robustness of their findings.

EXAMPLES China is one of the most frequent cases for studies on judiciaries in authoritarian regimes. For example, Wang (2020) argued that China under President Xi Jinping was able to make courts independent of local officials and significantly reduce external court interference. Ahl (2019) focused on the Chinese Supreme People's Court as an example of judicialization of authoritarian politics and concluded that "the court has certain room for maneuvering and can simultaneously promote an agenda relating to its own institutional interests" (Ahl 2019: 275). A number of studies also focus on the role of courts in regime transformation (Helmke 2002; Kapiszewski 2011; Sánchez et al. 2011; Solomon 2000; Sólyom 2003). Recently, the impact of constitutional reform on the judiciary in Turkey and the performance of the Turkish Constitutional Court has been studied by Aydin-Cakir (2018), Bâli (2013), and Varol et al. (2017).

IMPACT ON POLICY In authoritarian regimes, judiciaries typically have limited power and influence compared to their counterparts in democracies. However, as discussed above, the exact impact of judiciaries on policy-making in authoritarian regimes varies depending on the specific characteristics and goals of the particular regime. For example, in their study on competitive authoritarianism, Levitsky and Way (2010) recognize the judicial arena as one of the four arenas of contestation between the opposition and the authoritarian government.

NEW FRONTIERS Most of the studies on judiciaries in authoritarian regimes are single case studies; the number of cross-regional comparative studies is limited, although exceptions do exist: Rusakova et al. 2021; Solomon 2010; Wang 2020. Most case studies embrace a qualitative and descriptive approach; however, a pioneering work in this regard is Solis and Zvobgo (2023), who quantitatively analyze judicial independence in terms of protecting the press. More cross-regional comparisons, applications of existing typologies, and quantitative studies are needed.

How to cite:

Kopeček, Vincenc, 2025. Judiciaries in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ahl, B., 2019. Judicialization in Authoritarian Regimes: The Expansion of Powers of the Chinese Supreme People's Court. International Journal of Constitutional Law, 17:1.

Aquilar Férnadez, P. and Ríos Figueora. J., 2014. Judicial Institutions and the Dilemmas of Power-Sharing and Control in Authoritarian Regimes. CIDE.

Aydin-Cakir, A., 2018. The Impact of Judicial Preferences and Political Context on Constitutional Court Decisions: Evidence from Turkey. International Journal of Constitutional Law, 16:4.

Bâli, A., 2013. Courts and Constitutional Transition: Lessons from the Turkish Case. International Journal of Constitutional Law, 11:3.

Barros, R., 2002. Constitutionalism and Dictatorship: Pinochet, the Junta, and the 1980 Constitution. Cambridge University Press.

Ginsburg, T. and Moustafa, T., 2008. Introduction: The Functions of Courts in Authoritarian Politics. In Rule by Law: The Politics of Courts in Authoritarian Regimes, Moustafa, T. and Ginsburg, T., eds., Cambridge University Press.

Helmke, G., 2002. The Logic of Strategic Defection: Court–Executive Relations in Argentina Under Dictatorship and Democracy. American Political Science Review, 96:2.

Hilbink, L., 2007. Judges beyond Politics in Democracy and Dictatorship: Lessons from Chile. Cambridge University Press.

Kapiszewski, D., 2011. Power Broker, Policy Maker, or Rights Protector? The Brazilian Supremo Tribunal Federal in Transition. In Courts in Latin America, Helmke, G. and Rios-Figueroa, J., eds., Cambridge University Press.

Kaufmann, D. and Kraay, A., 2023. Worldwide Governance Indicators. The World Bank.

Kureshi, Y., 2021. When Judges Defy Dictators: An Audience-Based Framework to Explain the Emergence of Judicial Assertiveness against Authoritarian Regimes. Comparative Politics, 53:2.

Levitsky, S. and Way. L.A., 2010. Competitive Authoritarianism: Hybrid Regimes after the Cold War. Cambridge University Press.

Linz, J. J., 1964. An Authoritarian Regime: Spain. In Cleavages, Ideologies and Party Systems: Contributions to Comparative Political Sociology, Allardt, E. and Littunen, Y., eds., Academic Bookstore.

Moustafa, T. and Ginsburg, T., eds., 2008. Rule by Law: The Politics of Courts in Authoritarian Regimes. Cambridge University Press.

Moustafa, T., 2014. Law and Courts in Authoritarian Regimes. Annual Review of Law and Social Science, 10:1.

Rusakova, E.P., Frolova, E.E. and Arzumanova. L.L., 2021. Challenges of the Judicial Systems of the Russian Federation and People's Republic of China in the Era of the Pandemic. In Modern Global Economic System: Evolutional Development vs. Revolutionary Leap, Popkova, E.G. and Sergi, B.S., eds., Springer.

Sánchez, A., Magaloni, B. and Magar, E., 2011. Legalist versus Interpretativist: The Supreme Court and the Democratic Transition in Mexico. In Courts in Latin America, Helmke, G. and Rios-Figueroa, J., eds., Cambridge University Press.

Solis, J.A. and Zvobgo, K., 2023. Defending the Watchdogs: How Citizens and Courts Protect the Press. Journal of Human Rights, 22:3.

Solomon, P.H., 1996. Soviet Criminal Justice Under Stalin. Cambridge University Press.

Solomon, P.H., 2010. Authoritarian Legality and Informal Practices: Judges, Lawyers and the State in Russia and China. Communist and Post-Communist Studies, 43:4.
Solomon, P.H., 2000. Courts and Transition in Russia: The Challenge of Judicial Reform. Westview Press.
Sólyom, L., 2003. The Role of Constitutional Courts in the Transition to Democracy: With Special Reference to Hungary. International Sociology, 18:1.
Toharia, J.J., 1975. Judicial Independence in an Authoritarian Regime: The Case of Contemporary Spain. Law & Society Review, 9:3.
Varol, O.O., Dalla Pellegrina, L. and Garoupa, N., 2017. An Empirical Analysis of Judicial Transformation in Turkey. The American Journal of Comparative Law, 65:1.
Wang, Y., 2020. The More Authoritarian, the More Judicial Independence? The Paradox of Court Reforms in China and Russia. University of Pennsylvania Journal of Constitutional Law, 22:2.

Legislatures in Authoritarian Regimes

The fifth convocation of the State Duma had approved the vast majority of bills presented to it; this fact demonstrates the great advantage of our country in comparison with other countries in this time of crisis.
– Vladimir V. Putin, Russian president and war criminal

Authoritarian regimes have adopted a number of nominally democratic institutions, including legislatures. While in democracies, legislatures are responsible for passing laws and controlling the government, in authoritarian regimes, their role frequently differs and spans from a mere façade or rubber stamp to an institution used for controlling the opposition, co-optation, and distribution of prebends (cf. prebendalism).

DEFINITION Legislatures in authoritarian regimes should be seen as formal institutions, but at the same time, they typically perform different functions than their democratic counterparts (see section key significance). Gandhi et al. (2020: 1363-1365) summarize the two main differences between legislatures in democracies and authoritarianism. First, in authoritarianism, legislatures do not represent constituents, and instead of reelection, legislatures are rather driven by other incentives. Second, legislatures in authoritarianism do not exist with a genuine separation of powers; on the contrary, they can be bypassed or controlled by the executive or ruling party.

SEE ALSO This entry follows several others that highlight informality in various types of institutions under dictatorship, like judiciaries and bureaucracies. A related entry is election & electoral malpractice and that of authoritarian parties.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE As Gandhi et al. (2020: 1360) note, the widespread presence of legislatures in non-democracies represents a "central puzzle in the study of authoritarian politics and institutions." Naturally, answers to this puzzle differ significantly, but they can be summarized into four main analytical perspectives. First, the legislature in an authoritarian context is merely ceremonial; it does not have any substantial power and acts as a rubber stamp. Second, the legislature in an authoritarian context is a remnant of once a fully democratic institution, or it is a kind of proto-democratic institution that may develop into a fully democratic one. Third, the legislature in authoritarian regimes performs functions that are unique for the particular regime. Fourth, although the power of legislatures is limited and the dictator can dominate the decision-making process, the legislatures play a significant role in policy-making.

The first analytical perspective finds strong empirical support from quantitative data from the V-Dem dataset, which clearly shows that legislatures in authoritarian regimes are relatively weak and may be indeed considered as rubber-stamp institutions or as a democratic façade – if their formal role, i.e., approving the laws, is observed (Williamson & Magaloni 2020: 1530). The second analytical perspective is typically used by authors studying electoral or competitive authoritarianism (Levitsky & Way 2010; Schedler 2006; 2013). In this regard, legislatures, as well as elections are arenas of genuine but unfair contestation between the incumbent and opposition. The third analytical perspective is shared by scholars who focus on the informal role of legislatures in power-sharing arrangements which enable co-optation and concessions as well as distribution of rents (see also rent-seeking), prebends (see also prebendalism) and other pay-offs.

For example, Jennifer Gandhi (2010) argues that nominally democratic institutions, including legislatures, are used by dictators if they need to make concessions and find compromise. She also adds that institutionalized dictatorships tend to be more liberal and that institutionalization has a positive impact on economic growth, but she does not share the assumption that nominally democratic institutions have a positive impact on the survival of a dictator (cf. also Gandhi & Przeworski 2007).

Additionally, legislatures in authoritarian regimes can serve as a mechanism for gathering information and feedback from different segments of society. Authoritarian rulers need to maintain a level of control and stability, and legislatures provide a controlled environment where grievances and demands can be articulated without spilling over into less violent forms of contestation. This can help the regime gauge public opinion and preempt unrest by addressing certain demands before they escalate into broader movements (Pepinsky 2014).

On the other hand, Ezrow and Frantz (2011: 2) argue that "dictatorships rely on parties and legislatures because they help to prolong their survival." Wright and Escribà-Folch (2012) claim that while the existence of a legislature in authoritarian regimes increases their stability, it is the existence of more political parties, which increases the likelihood of democratic transition. In one of his previous studies, Wright (2008) also argues that it is only binding legislatures, i.e., those that effectively constrain the dictator, which has a positive impact on economic growth. An innovative argument on the role of legislatures in authoritarian regimes was brought by Reuter & Robertson (2015), who claim "that legislatures reduce social protest by providing rent-seeking opportunities to key opposition elites who, in return for access to these spoils, demobilize their supporters."

Recently, there has been growing attention to the fourth analytical perspective, i.e., the role of legislatures in policy-making. Authors supporting this analytical perspective argue that dictators "do not [...] make all policy decisions themselves" (Williamson & Magaloni 2020: 1527) and delegate them to other actors, including legislatures. As summarized by Gandhi et al. (2020) and Williamson & Magaloni (2020), there can be a plethora of reasons for this, stemming from the fear of making unpopular decisions to the distribution of non-financial pay-offs for authoritarian elites. In some cases, legislatures engage in open debates on delegated policy issues, holding officials accountable and shaping public perceptions of government performance. In Vietnam, for example, such debates can influence how the public assigns blame for poor performance (Williamson & Magaloni 2020).

ORIGIN The history of a legislature as an assembly with the authority to adopt laws dates back to ancient city-states, such as Athens and its Ecclesia. In medieval European monarchies, the power to legislate was usually shared by both the monarch and the states as representatives of the nobility, the clergy, and the commoners. In the Enlightenment period, political philosophers such as John Locke and Charles Louis de Montesquieu formulated the theory of separation of powers, where the legislature was independent of the executive. In modern democracies, the legislature is not only independent of the executive, but the legislators are elected as people's representatives in free and fair elections and the legislature as such constitutes one of the fundamental democratic political institutions. Democracy, however, is not the only regime that has institutionalized legislatures; according to Przeworski et al. (2013), about 80% of non-democracies that have existed from the nineteenth century up to the present have had legislatures.

A pioneering work on the role of legislatures in authoritarian countries was Portes' (1977) analysis of the Mexican legislature. However, the systematic research on legislatures in authoritarianisms dates back only to the 1990s with the institutional turn in studies of authoritarianism (Pepinsky 2014) and has been growing since that time.

LITERATURE The main accounts of the neo-institutionalist approach in studies of authoritarianism are: Svolik 2012; Gandhi 2010; Frantz & Ezrow 2011; Barros 2002. A general overview of studies of legislatures in authoritarian regimes is provided by Schuler & Malesky 2014; Gandhi et al. 2020; Williamson & Magaloni 2020.

CLASSIFICATIONS There are two main options for classifying legislatures in authoritarian regimes – (A) according to the logic of their formation and (B) according to their position in the political system. In the first case (A), Przeworski et al. (2013) differentiate between (i) fully-appointed legislature, (ii) partially-elected legislature, and (iii) fully-elected legislature. In the case of a fully-elected legislature, the criterion to what extent the elections are competitive can also be added. On a large dataset, Prezeworski et al. (2013) also demonstrated that the likelihood of fully-elected legislatures in authoritarian countries is less likely in monarchies and more likely in civilian non-hereditary regimes.

A similar typology was provided by Gandhi (2010), who simply distinguished between elected and appointed legislatures and demonstrated on her own dataset that the elected ones largely prevail. In the latter case (B), a few classifications have been developed, but they generally follow the same logic. For example, Gandhi et al. (2003) differentiated between rubber-stamp legislatures and strong legislatures, while Wright (2008) distinguished between binding and nonbinding legislatures, reflecting to what extent the legislatures constrain dictatorial power. The agency of this institution is also a metric in measures of personalization.

MEASUREMENT The basic feature that can be measured is the legislature's size. While in democratic countries, the size of the legislature is typically a function of population size and the effective number of parties (Jacobs & Otjes 2015), other factors play a role in dictatorships. For example, Taagepera (1972) demonstrated that in communist dictatorships of the second half of the twentieth century, there was a tendency toward larger legislatures, possibly because of a larger social mobilization, while other types of regimes, including democracies, had smaller legislatures without significant differences in their size. However, Tollison's (1988: 349) claim that "larger legislature generally means that reaching decisions about passing laws is harder" would suggest that excessively large legislatures in authoritarian regimes are more likely to signal rubber-stamp assemblies than those that effectively constrain the dictator.

Another variable that can be measured is the legislative performance expressed by the number of legislative defeats of the dictator in the legislative assembly or by the number of legislative amendments. As Bonvecchi and Simison (2017: 535) argue, the "probability of these outcomes tended to be higher the more fragmented and unstable the distribution of political power."

Fish and Kroening (2009) developed the Parliamentary Powers Index (PPI), a composite index measuring parliamentary strength. It was applied to legislatures in authoritarian regimes by Wilson & Woldense (2019) and Wiebrecht (2021). Quantitative data on the strength of legislatures are also provided by the V-Dem dataset (Varieties of Democracy).

Finally, it is also the political composition of a particular legislature that can be measured. Figures that may be relevant in terms of the weakness or strength of a particular legislature or that may be indicative of the type of regime include political fragmentation, the proportion of opposition deputies in an authoritarian legislature or the proportion of non-partisan deputies. See also political parties and elections in authoritarian regimes.

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES The basic methodological challenge of studying legislatures in authoritarian regimes dwells in the fact that they typically perform different functions than legislatures in democracies. This may lead some scholars to the conclusion that legislatures in authoritarian regimes are a mere façade; while this may be true in some cases, it has to be stressed that even a façade fulfills certain roles. In other words, legislatures as institutions in authoritarian countries should not be studied using D. Easton's model of a political system (systems theory), where it is supposed that legislatures fulfill constitutionally prescribed roles such as control of the government, representation, and legislation, but rather using G.A. Almond's model of structural functionalism, where different institutions can perform the main input and output functions of each political system.

Frequently, the legislatures in authoritarian countries may fulfill functions rather within informality than within formal constitutional settings. Misperception of the function of legislatures in authoritarian countries can lead to two types of false conclusions which form a kind of vicious circle. (a) Assuming that legislatures in authoritarian countries are always a façade with no meaningful function in the political system may lead to underestimating or overlooking their roles. (b) Sticking to the analysis of their nominal functions as stated in constitutions may lead to false assumptions that they are a mere façade. To sum it up, legislatures in authoritarian countries should be studied in relevant theoretical contexts; given the fact that many of their functions can be studied as informal practices and that individual deputies can belong to informal networks, in terms of fieldwork, appropriate research techniques should be used. See the section on methodological issues in the entry informality.

EXAMPLES One of the most researched legislatures in authoritarian regimes is China's National People's Congress. In his major work, Truex (2016) developed the concept of "representation within bounds." He argues that the Chinese Communist Party encourages legislators to reflect the needs of their constituents for non-sensitive issues. Truex (2014) also studied the composition of the National People's Congress and its links with large Chinese companies, and the example of China's Food Safety Law provided insight into the legislative process in an authoritarian regime (Truex 2020). Other studies on China's Congress were also provided by Liu (2023) and Lü et al. (2020).

Another relatively well-researched legislature in an authoritarian regime is the Russian State Duma. For example, Krol (2020; 2021) demonstrated that the State Duma, as well as other parliaments in post-Soviet authoritarianisms, show a high level of legislative activity and initiatives. However, she also observed that parliamentary activity is higher when the opposition in the State Duma is weak (opposition members are typically excluded from the legislative process) and that "loyalists exploit an external threat of a large opposition by demanding more concessions in exchange for their loyalty" (Krol 2020: 265). Noble (2017; 2020) and Krol (2021) also provide a fresh look at how bills are amended in the State Duma.

IMPACT ON POLICY In authoritarian regimes, legislatures typically have limited power and influence compared to their counterparts in democratic systems. However, as discussed above, the exact impact of legislatures on policy-making in authoritarian regimes varies depending on the specific characteristics and goals of the particular regime.

NEW FRONTIERS While there has been an explosion of literature on the role of legislatures in authoritarian regimes, it concentrates on a few cases – China, Russia, Vietnam, and Kazakhstan. More case studies and comparative studies from different regions and on different types of authoritarian regimes are needed, as well as studies focusing on both present-day and historical cases.

How to cite:

Kopeček, Vincenc, 2025. Legislatures in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Barros, R., 2002. Constitutionalism and Dictatorship: Pinochet, the Junta, and the 1980 Constitution. Cambridge University Press.

Bonvecchi, A. and Simison, E., 2017. Legislative Institutions and Performance in Authoritarian Regimes. Comparative Politics, 49:4.

Ezrow, N. M. and Frantz, E., 2011. State Institutions and the Survival of Dictatorships. Journal of International Affairs, 65:1.

Fish, M.S., and Kroenig, M., 2009. The Handbook of National Legislatures: A Global Survey. Cambridge University Press.

Frantz, E. and Ezrow, N., 2011. The Politics of Dictatorship: Institutions and Outcomes in Authoritarian Regimes. Lynne Rienner Publishers.

Gandhi, J., 2010. Political Institutions under Dictatorship. Cambridge University Press.

Gandhi, J., Gochal, J. and Saiegh, S., 2003. Governments' Legislative Defeats under Dictatorship. Paper presented at the annual meeting of the Midwestern Political Science Association.

Gandhi, J., Noble, B. and Svolik, M., 2020. Legislatures and Legislative Politics Without Democracy. Comparative Political Studies, 53:9.

Gandhi, J. and Przeworski, A., 2007. Authoritarian Institutions and the Survival of Autocrats. Comparative Political Studies, 40:11.

Jacobs, K. and Otjes, S., 2015. Explaining the Size of Assemblies. A Longitudinal Analysis of the Design and Reform of Assembly Sizes in Democracies around the World. Electoral Studies, 40.
Krol, G., 2020. Parliamentary Initiative in Authoritarian Regimes: Power Sharing in Eurasian Legislatures. The Journal of Legislative Studies, 26:2.
Krol, G., 2021. The Legislative Role of the Russian Duma and the Kazakh Mazhilis: Authoritarianism and Power Sharing in Post-Soviet Eurasia. Post-Soviet Affairs, 37:6.
Levitsky, S. and Way, L.A., 2010. Competitive Authoritarianism: Hybrid Regimes after the Cold War. Cambridge University Press.
Liu, D., 2023. Policy Influence of Delegates in Authoritarian Legislatures: Evidence from China. Political Research Quarterly, 76:2.
Lü, X., Liu, M. and Li, F., 2020. Policy Coalition Building in an Authoritarian Legislature: Evidence From China's National Assemblies (1983-2007). Comparative Political Studies, 53:9.
Noble, B., 2017. Amending Budget Bills in the Russian State Duma. Post-Communist Economies, 29:4.
Noble, B., 2020. Authoritarian Amendments: Legislative Institutions as Intraexecutive Constraints in Post-Soviet Russia. Comparative Political Studies, 53:9.
Pepinsky, T., 2014. The Institutional Turn in Comparative Authoritarianism. British Journal of Political Science, 44:3.
Portes, A., 1977. Legislatures Under Authoritarian Regimes: The Case of Mexico. Journal of Political & Military Sociology, 5:2.
Przeworski, A. et al., 2013. Political Institutions and Political Events (PIPE) Data Set. Department of Politics, New York University.
Reuter, O. J. and Robertson, G. B., 2015. Legislatures, Cooptation, and Social Protest in Contemporary Authoritarian Regimes. The Journal of Politics, 77:1.
Schedler, A., ed. 2006. Electoral Authoritarianism. The Dynamics of Unfree Competition. Lynne Rienner Publishers.
Schedler, A., 2013. The Politics of Uncertainty: Sustaining and Subverting Electoral Authoritarianism. Oxford University Press.
Schuler, P. and Malesky, E.J. 2014. Authoritarian Legislatures. In The Oxford Handbook of Legislative Studies, Martin, S., Saalfeld, T. and Strøm, K.W., eds. Oxford University Press.
Svolik, M.W., 2012. The Politics of Authoritarian Rule. Cambridge University Press.
Taagepera, R., 1972. The Size of National Assemblies. Social Science Research, 1:4.
Tollison, R.D., 1988. Public Choice and Legislation. Virginia Law Review, 74:2.
Truex, R., 2014. The Returns to Office in a "Rubber Stamp" Parliament. The American Political Science Review, 108:2.
Truex, R., 2016. Making Autocracy Work: Representation and Responsiveness in Modern China. Cambridge University Press.
Truex, R., 2020. Authoritarian Gridlock? Understanding Delay in the Chinese Legislative System. Comparative Political Studies, 53:9.
Wiebrecht, F., 2021. Between Elites and Opposition: Legislatures' Strength in Authoritarian Regimes. Democratization, 28:6.
Williamson, S. and Magaloni, B., 2020. Legislatures and Policy Making in Authoritarian Regimes. Comparative Political Studies, 53:9.
Wilson, M.C. and Woldense, J., 2019. Contested or Established? A Comparison of Legislative Powers across Regimes. Democratization, 26:4.
Wright, J., 2008. Do Authoritarian Institutions Constrain? How Legislatures Affect Economic Growth and Investment. American Journal of Political Science, 52:2.
Wright, J. and Escribà-Folch. A., 2012. Authoritarian Institutions and Regime Survival: Transitions to Democracy and Subsequent Autocracy. British Journal of Political Science, 42:2.

Parties in Authoritarian Regimes

The party is everything to us; it is our guide through history and our weapon for achieving great victories for socialism.
– Nicolae Ceaușescu, The Romania We Love (1983)

The Encyclopedia Tyrannica touches upon the subject of ruling parties across several entries, with a particular focus on single-party regimes, which are considered the archetypal party-based regime type. That entry also makes mention of several regime types where single-parties are likely to occur, such as communist, fascist, or colonial regimes (see its section on 'classifications'). However, not all political regimes can be conceptualized solely through the nature of their ruling political party.

Therefore, this entry provides an overview of different types of ruling parties that can exist within various regimes, noting that political regimes can transition between different types of parties during their lifespan.

For instance, a military regime might begin as a no-party regime – closely aligning with the pure type of military regime – but could later organize and win uncompetitive elections while retaining military power. These elections are unlikely to be very free or fair, resulting in a hegemonic party system. If the electoral move is just performative, and a party structure is created to facilitate co-optation and patronage distribution, this military regime can become a single-party hybrid. So, this entry notes that different types of parties can appear in several authoritarian regimes and may be combined with other forms of domination like military rule, monarchies or guiding ideologies.

Nonetheless, various regime classifications attempt to systematize and label these party types and link them to specific regime types. Table 8.1 illustrates how associated regime classifications often overlap with specific types of ruling parties, indicating a lack of consensus among scholars on classification methods. Competing views are often found in trichotomous categories, though some newer polychotomous categories also differentiate elections and the degree of freedom and fairness among them.

Table 8.1 – Different Ruling Parties, Legitimacy & Classifications

Source of Legitimacy	Democratic Ideology		Patronage & other ideologies		Guiding ideology*
	Elections				Repression
Type of party	Democratic Party		Dominant Party	Hegemonic Party	Totalitarian Party
					Single-Party
Assoicated regime classifications	Liberal democracy	Electoral democracy	Competitive authoritharianism	Hegemonic electoral authoritarian	Closed autocratic regimes
	Democracy		Electoral authoritharianism
			Hybrid regimes

Source: Authors' own work, based on Gilbert & Mohseni 2011; Schedler 2006; Levitsky & Way 2010

This overview of ruling parties is not merely classification along a scale of pluralism; other dimensions, like ideology, play a crucial role. For political regimes to be considered liberal democracies, they must also embrace democratic ideology – 'electoralism' alone is insufficient. To classify as ideocracy, a dominant guiding ideology with a blueprint for societal transformation needs to be present, and the party needs to be a vanguard mass party to merit the label totalitarianism.

Also, technically all ruling parties can become vehicles for personalist rule (not shown in Table 8.1), and these can operate in democratic systems (e.g., the US under Donald Trump's first term), dominant party systems (J. Kaczyński and the Law & Justice Party (PiS) in Poland) or hegemonic party systems (Viktor Orbán and Fidesz in Hungary), but also in single-party systems (Mobutu's Mouvement Populaire de la Révolution (MPR) in Zaire/DRC or Nazarbayev's Nur Otan in Kazakhstan) and even in totalitarian parties (the Communist Party of the Soviet Union (CPSU) under Stalin). The constitutional guardrails and check-and-balances of those political systems (if any are left) may slow the ongoing personalization (spreading from the party to the rest of the regime). Alternatively, leader change, succession or democratization can result in transformations in the other direction (toward collegial rule).

Different party types can evolve into neighboring types; democratic parties may become dominant if democratic values are abandoned. Dominant parties can become hegemonic if they control a large enough share of the legislature and suppress competition. When competition is effectively eliminated, the regime enters the realm of single-party systems, though significant variation remains between regime types: Parties can have armed wings or not. Furthermore, military-civilian hybrids might allow some competition and become hegemonic-party hybrids or merely set up civilian party structures to distribute patronage and co-opt potential challengers, thus forming a military single-party amalgam.

This entry on parties in authoritarian regimes is conceptually linked to entries on elections & electoral malpractice and illustrates how various regime classifications – from trichotomous categories and continuous measures – have focused on capturing the nature of party rule among autocratic variations. Recently, polychotomous categories have joined this analytical effort in pigeonholing various from of electoralism.

TOTALITARIAN PARTIES Totalitarian systems, which have become increasingly rare, rely on one single party, which is all-encompassing. In these systems, the party is an extensive organization capable of mass mobilization. Carl J. Friedrich and Zbigniew Brzezinski identified a 'totalist ideology' as an important characteristic of totalitarian parties (1956). Totalitarian parties are known for espousing a specific ideology that is meant to guide society toward a utopian vision for the country (Linz 2000). As these types of systems often emerge from revolutionary movements, the ideology may evolve from being in a state of constant revolution to the implementation of the party's objectives (Cassinelli 1962). Citizens are indoctrinated with the party's ideological program, in some cases, from birth (Tucker 1965).

In order to implement this utopian agenda, parties in totalitarian systems are completely fused with the state, and the party organization is superior to or equal to the government (Linz 2000). At every level of government and in every aspect of daily life, the party dominates and permeates society. The party plays an important role not just in implementing the agenda of the party but also in activating citizens to be loyal foot soldiers of the regime (Linz 2000). These types of parties tend to be led by a highly charismatic leader, but as a personality cult develops, this may, ironically, weaken the party's organization over time (Tucker 1965).

Today very few parties would qualify as a totalitarian party, with the exception of the Worker's Party of Korea (WPK) in North Korea. In the last few years, North Korean leader Kim Jong-Un has reinvigorated the WPK as the core political organ of the regime (Albert 2020). In spite of this, the WPK does not meet that frequently, with the last major meeting taking place in 2016, which constituted the first full meeting of the country's ruling elite in 36 years. In contrast, in the Soviet Union, the CPSU held party congresses every few years to hail the major historical and ideological accomplishments of the party (Tertiitsky 2016).

SINGLE PARTIES Political parties in single-party dictatorships are parties that have exclusive control over policy-making and political offices (Geddes 2005). Other parties may be allowed to operate and compete in elections, but their power is minimal, as the single party dominates the legislature (de jure or de facto) with no genuine pressure coming from other parties. At best, other parties operate as token opposition parties that work with a single party. Genuine opposition parties may be banned, see most of its members imprisoned or face constant threats and harassment. Elections may take place but only serve to funnel information about how popular the ruling party is or not and do not pose any threat to the ruling party's domination (Gandhi & Przeworski 2007).

In terms of the structure of single-party regimes, the party's leader is almost always the leader of the country, who is selected for this position by the party's central committee or politburo (Box 8.4). The power of the leader of the ruling party varies depending on the leader's charisma and popularity, as well as on how much veto and monitoring power other party members possess over the leader (Tsebelis 2000). In the case of Mexico, under the Institutional Revolutionary Party (PRI), though the president was always powerful, the PRI factions kept any one president from seizing total control (Langston 2017) – see also term limits. This contrasts with the single-party regime in Angola under the People's Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA) led by José Eduardo dos Santos, who was president for 38 years.

The ruling party in single-party regimes is a fairly extensive organization but does not control every aspect of citizens' lives.However, the party controls nearly all of the state institutions and dominates most aspects of political life, including local government, civil society and the media. Most civil service jobs would require membership in the party. This is often used as a way of luring citizens to join the party and become loyal members – as was the case when Golkar was building up its operation in Indonesia under Suharto (Smith 2005).

The party also remains somewhat committed to an ideology, but this may evolve. Many single-party regimes emerge from revolution, lose their revolutionary zeal and are forced to adapt to a new role as a ruling party. In addition to emerging after a revolution, more generally speaking, research has demonstrated that most one-party dictatorships are established in the aftermath of another dictatorship (Magaloni & Kricheli 2010).

Single parties operate in closed authoritarian regimes, such as in China, where the Chinese Communist Party (CCP) has dominated since 1949. Though officially eight other political parties are allowed to exist in China, the CCP chooses their leaders and none of these parties have ever pushed for any reform or openly opposed the ruling party (Baptista 2021). The main role of these small opposition parties is to provide a greater veneer of legitimacy and offer occasional consultation. Though they are allowed to exist, there is never any doubt about what party is in charge.

HEGEMONIC PARTIES There are two interpretations of hegemonic parties. Some scholars see hegemonic parties as dominantly controlling the legislature (Howard & Roessler 2006), while others explore the possibility that hegemonic parties could be operating in competitive authoritarian regimes – a narrower subset of electoral authoritarian regimes (Levitsky & Way 2002). In the latter's view, hegemonic parties are used synonymously with dominant parties (see below) but heavily favored to win, though the victory is not always decisive. In the former view, however, the hegemonic party wins almost all of the seats. The reality is that there may be a wide range of victories for hegemonic parties, with Singapore under the People's Action Party regularly receiving over 80% of legislative seats (Tan 2015), while Fidesz in Hungary is holding 58% of the seats as of 2024. Regardless of how hegemonic parties are conceived, the party dominates the legislature, but there is some competition. Other genuine opposition parties actually exist and try to contend elections.

Cambodia's People's Party used to be hegemonic, while other opposition parties were allowed to compete until 2018, when it banned all opposition and won all 125 seats in the National Assembly – becoming a single-party regime (Morgenbesser 2019). It is possible that Mexico under the PRI was better conceived as a hegemonic party than a single-party regime, but that depends on the degree of competition that the PRI faced over time. The PRI had dominated with more than 80% of the vote for years in the presidential elections and won 100% of the vote in 1976. However, by 1988, the level of competition had changed, and the PRI presidential candidate, Carlos Salinas, only won with 50.7% of the vote.

Because hegemonic parties are not the only viable parties, they have to rely to some degree on obtaining citizen acquiescence. State resources are used to reward those who are loyal and to punish those who are disloyal. The hegemonic party tends to benefit from a dense organizational network that is used to monitor citizens, while control over state resources is used to induce citizens to support the party (Magaloni 2006). Hegemonic parties put a great deal of effort into winning elections and bringing out a large turnout, even though they are almost certain to win no matter what (Simpser 2005; Magaloni 2006). The hegemonic party aims to rule with a super-majority to project an image of invincibility and to push through the party's agenda, although the exact mechanism of such an intimidation effect has not been proven (Ananyev & Poyker 2022).

As a result of this focus on winning elections, the ideological strength and commitment of hegemonic parties varies considerably. Some hegemonic parties have a more cohesive ideology, such as Fidesz or the Justice and Development Party (AKP) in Turkey, which are both committed to right-wing populism, conservatism and nationalism. In comparison, the Kenyan National African Union (KANU) is supposed to have a center-right ideology but has become more focused on patronage allocation and clientelism along tribal lines (Kanyinga 1994).

DOMINANT PARTIES In the study of comparative authoritarianism, dominant parties represent a distinct type within a broader spectrum of electoral party systems. Such ruling parties can be understood in relation to others, either as weak or nascent hegemonic parties or rogue actors in competitive multi-party systems. In any case, they differ in terms of political competition, institutional structures, the role of opposition, and the uncertain outcomes of meaningful but flawed elections.

A dominant-party system is characterized by a political party that consistently controls government power over an extended period by successfully dividing the opposition and creating winning coalitions and/or skewing the playing field (unfair) without restricting it for challenges (no parties or candidates are banned on political grounds; the elections are still 'free').

Unlike hegemonic parties, which entirely suppress the opposition and operate in a context where genuine competition is no longer a threat, dominant parties exist in systems where the opposition, despite significant disadvantages, might still win. Levitsky & Way were the first to classify political regimes along these criteria, but other trichotomous categories have covered them as well: e.g., Schedler. Hadenius & Teorell (2007) found that such types of electoral autocracies were the main pathway toward democratization.

Elections under dominant party systems are competitive but not fair, as the dominant party manipulates institutional rules, its incumbency advantage (Box 8.2), resources (i.e., media coverage), and the political environment (e.g., COVID-19 restrictions) to maintain and improve its position or set up elections for the regime to win them. This manipulation often includes patronage networks, media control, and systemic electoral advantages. Zambia has been classified as a competitive authoritarian regime, particularly under President Edgar Lungu's leadership. Despite efforts to manipulate state resources and control the media and judiciary to secure reelection, Lungu lost the 2021 election to the opposition leader Hakainde Hichilema (Kerr et al. 2024).

By comparison, hegemonic parties go further in eliminating political contestation, relying more on (overt) repression. Unlike dominant parties, hegemonic parties do not rely on subtle manipulation but instead outright ban or suppress any alternatives to their rule. For this reason, one can theorize that dominant parties rely on domestic legitimacy sourced from elections, while hegemonic parties rely more on coercion and, foremost, use elections to signal to international audiences and gain some external legitimacy.

Giovanni Sartori's typology (1976) of party systems provides a framework for understanding where dominant parties fit in relation to other types. Sartori distinguishes between systems with no competition (hegemonic), limited competition (dominant), and full competition (multiparty systems). Dominant party systems thus inhabit a gray area between authoritarianism and democracy: these hybrid regimes use democratic institutions as a façade while undermining their substance to ensure the ruling party's prolonged dominance.

PERSONALIST PARTIES Political parties in personalist regimes are subsumed under the leader or created by the leader in order to serve their purpose. As described above, such personalization can take place in any party structure. Alberto Lioy (2023) provides a comprehensive examination of the definitions and classifications of personal (pertaining to a leader) and distinguishes between personalist (being and acting as such) and personalized (having become so) political parties.

A political party may exist, but its policy platform mirrors the dictator's interests. The party does not have much of an ideology at all. For example, in Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo) led by Joseph Mobutu, the Popular Revolutionary Movement (MPR) embodied 'Mobutism,' an eclectic ideology that glorified Mobutu personally and reflected his thoughts and actions. The party's ideology advocated acts of loyalty to Mobutu, public praise of Mobutu and promotion of his personality cult (Ikome 2008). In Russia, the United Russia Party (Единая Россия – Yedinaya Rossiya) is also not ideological, though Russian elites may share the same set of values and beliefs as Vladimir Putin (Snegovaya & McGlynn 2024). Nur Otan in Kazakhstan and the Yeni Azerbaijan Party are also hegemonic personalist examples (Bader 2011).

In personalist regimes, the party is kept intentionally institutionally weak to mitigate threats to the dictator's power. The leader dominates the party's internal life and makes all of the important decisions, such as the direction and vision of the party's platform (Loxton & Levitsky 2018). Parties in personalist regimes are also very transient. They do not tend to outlast the leader. For example, in the case of Peru under Alberto Fujimori, disposable parties were created, which were minimalist organizations formed for a single election and then discarded, such as Cambio 90 in 1990, New Majority in 1995, and Let's Go Neighbours in 1998 (Levitsky 1999).

Rather than serving as a vehicle to attract mass support, the party in personalist regimes is utilized by the dictator to serve the dictator's interests and co-opt a narrow group of elites. The dictator may frequently shuffle positions in the party from one person to the next in order to generate suspicion and competition among elites. The party is also not filled with technocrats or anyone with expertise (Ezrow & Frantz 2011). Instead, the party is filled with loyalists, other family members and cronies. Though it may be important to be a member of the party to receive a position in the state, the bureaucracy is largely hollowed out. All of the institutions of the state serve as rubber stamps to the personal whims and interests of the dictator. The party is not involved in any decision making – as the dictators themselves make the most important decisions. While members of the party in more institutionalized systems can provide consultation, which may slow down policy output, the personalist leader is free to rule by decree. The party lauds all of the decisions of the leader, and offers little restraint to the leader (Ezrow & Frantz 2011).

If the personalist dictatorship holds elections, the process is very transactional. Voting is based on fear, reward, or both. The party provides no representation or accountability, nor does it offer information to citizens. There is a wide variation in the performance of personalist dictatorships when it comes to the role of the party in motivating citizens to vote and get involved in political processes, but usually, the party in personalist regimes is a thin organization. Based on case studies, voter turnout is low, and the party cannot play a significant mobilization effort. One study looking at Venezuela and Russia found that the party was considerably less effective in motivating citizens to vote compared to employers (Frye et al. 2019).

PARTIES WINGS Some political parties are attached to militant groups. This may take place in two ways – either a violent non-state actor decides to build a political wing and participate in politics (such as was the case with Hamas and Hezbollah), or a political party in opposition decides to change tactics and turn to violence, such as was the case with the Mozambique Liberation Front (FRELIMO) in Mozambique (Ezrow 2017). In the case of the latter, the party formed in opposition to colonial rule by the Portuguese and originally tried to use peaceful tactics, but changed course when that was not working and launched a massive guerrilla movement for independence from Portugal in 1964. While the militant wing was fighting, the political wing mostly advocated socialist ideals and later nationalism (Martins 2017).

Political wings of violent non-state actors can enjoy high levels of legitimacy and political support, and many try to build up their membership by providing services to the community, such as education, healthcare and housing. Because of this, parties with militant wings have sophisticated levels of organization and recruitment. The political wing of the group will engage in contesting elections and participating in conventional politics, while the militant wing will engage in combat, armed conflict and or terror activities. Sometimes, the political wing denies that they are working with the violent wing, such as Sinn Fein and the Irish Republican Army (IRA), publicly declaring their separateness (Hueckel 2007).

Political parties with militant wings have very clearly articulated political agendas and objectives. The ideology is relatively coherent and may be moderated to appeal to a wider section of the public. Political parties with violent wings are often more careful in terms of how they use violence than violent non-state actors who lack political wings. They may want to temper the levels of violence, such as has been the case with ETA in Spain. Though ETA is not officially attached to any political party, it has been accused of being unofficially attached to Euskal Herritarok, a Basque party that has had the same goals as ETA and has never produced a statement claiming that it rejected violence (Bourne 2015). The party was banned in 2003, but in the past, it was able to win several seats in national parliamentary elections. Its electoral success was largely affected by the level of violence of ETA.

Political parties with militant wings are often well-networked as well. The party may receive more financial support from expats or private donors. Groups like Hamas benefited from support from private donations in the Persian Gulf, but today, most of its funding comes from Iran – providing the organization with about $100 million a year (Robinson 2024). Hamas uses that money to provide social services to attract potential members and to fund weapons and training.

Political parties with violent wings are not always associated with authoritarianism. In the case of South Africa, the African National Congress (ANC) was at various points labeled a terrorist group by the West. After the Sharpeville Massacre in March of 1960, where the police killed 69 Black South Africans during a peaceful protest, ANC leader Nelson Mandela felt that the organization had no choice but to abandon the non-violent strategy. It warned the South African government that acts of terrorism would ensue if the government did not move forward with constitutional reform to increase the political rights of Black South Africans, but these warnings were ignored. Fast forward to 1994, and the ANC, under the leadership of Mandela became the ruling party in South Africa. They have dominated South African politics ever since and are considered to be moving toward competitive authoritarianism; now, they are losing their support base after decades of systemic corruption.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha and Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Parties in Authoritarian Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Albert, E., 2020. North Korea's Power Structure. Council on Foreign Relations (CFR).

Ananyev, M. and Poyker, M., 2022. Do dictators signal strength with electoral fraud? European Journal of Political Economy, 71.

Bader, M., 2011. Hegemonic political parties in post-Soviet Eurasia: Toward party-based authoritarianism? Communist and Post-Communist Studies, 44:3.

Baptista, E., 2021. Communist Party is not China's only political party – there are eight others. South China Post.

Cassinelli, C.W., 1962. The totalitarian party. The Journal of Politics, 24:1.

Ezrow, N. 2017. Global Politics and Violent Non-State Actors. Sage Publications.

Ezrow, N. and Frantz, E. 2011. Dictators and Dictatorships: Understanding Authoritarian Regimes and their Leaders. The Continuum International Publishing Group.

Friedrich, C. and Brzezinski, Z. 1956. Totalitarian Dictatorship and Autocracy. Harvard University Press.

Frye, T., Reuter, O.J. and Szakonyi, D., 2019. Vote brokers, clientelist appeals, and voter turnout: Evidence from Russia and Venezuela. World politics, 71:4.

Gandhi, J. and Przeworski, A., 2007. Authoritarian institutions and the survival of autocrats. Comparative political studies, 40:11.

Geddes, B., 2005. Why parties and elections in authoritarian regimes? Annual meeting of the American Political Science Association.

Gilbert, L. and Mohseni, P., 2011. Beyond authoritarianism: The conceptualization of hybrid regimes. Studies in Comparative International Development, 46:3.

Hadenius, A., and Teorell, J., 2007. Pathways from Authoritarianism. Journal of Democracy, 18:1.
Hueckel, C., 2007. Sinn Fein without the IRA: Legitimacy or loss of popular support. University of North Florida.
Ikome, F.N., 2008. Personalisation of power. Political economy of regionalisation in Central Africa, 15.
Kanyinga, K., 1994. Ethnicity, Patronage and Class in a Local Arena: "High "and "Low "politics in Kiambu, Kenya, 1982-92. The New Local Level Politics in East Africa, 66.
Kerr, N., Krönke, M. and Wahman, M., 2024. Where are the sore losers? competitive authoritarianism, incumbent defeat, and electoral trust in Zambia's 2021 election. Public Opinion Quarterly, 88:SI.
Langston, J.K., 2017. Democratization and authoritarian party survival: Mexico's PRI. Oxford University Press.
Levitsky, S., 1999. Latin America's Imperiled Progress: Fujimori and Post-Party Politics in Peru. Journal of Democracy, 10:3.
Levitsky, S. and Way, L., 2010. Competitive Authoritarianism: Hybrid Regimes After the Cold War. Cambridge University Press.
Linz, J.J., 2000. Totalitarian and authoritarian regimes. Lynne Rienner Publishers.
Lioy, A., 2023. "Not To Be Taken Personally:" Tracing Six Decades of Scholarship on Personal, Personalist, and Personalized Political Parties (1960-2021). Political Studies Review, 21:4.
Lodge, T., 2011. Sharpeville: an apartheid massacre and its consequences. Oxford University Press.
Loxton, J. and Levitsky, S., 2018. Personalistic authoritarian successor parties in Latin America. Life after Dictatorship, Box 8.4 Politburo: The Engine of Communist Rule

Cadres decide everything.
– Joseph Stalin (1935)

The 'Politburo' (политбюро (politbyuro) short for политическое бюро – politicheskoe byuro or 'political bureau') was the principal policymaking and executive committee of the Communist Party in the Soviet Union (CPSU). It held supreme authority over both party and state decisions, making it the most powerful governing body in the Soviet political system. The Politburo was responsible for formulating policies, making key decisions, and overseeing the implementation of these policies across various sectors of government and society. It was the top of the pyramid in the nomenklatura system, cf. Box 1.11.

The first Politburo was created by the Bolshevik Party in 1917 during the Russian Revolution to provide continuous leadership during the uprising. After the revolution, it became a permanent body following the Eighth Party Congress in 1919. Over time, it assumed a dominant role in Soviet governance, overshadowing other institutions like the Central Committee. The Politburo's power extended across all aspects of Soviet life, including economic planning, military strategy, and internal security. The Central Committee nominally elected its members, but, in practice, it was a self-perpetuating body that controlled its membership.

Gorlizky (2007) exposed the internal dynamics of the Politburo under Stalin and argued that, rather than a single unified Politburo, there were actually multiple distinct 'politburos' by the late Stalin period. It suggests that even a political system as hierarchical as Stalinism demanded an appearance of unity and authority at its peak. Throughout the 1930s, Stalin reshaped the Politburo into a tool of his rule: what had once been a forum for political debate and struggle was, by the time of WWII, transformed into a compliant committee composed of Stalin's allies and sycophants. Unlike the Council of Ministers, the Politburo retained specific institutional responsibilities, including oversight of foreign affairs, security matters, and organizational issues. After the war, Stalin experimented with various organizational structures for the Politburo. This diversity, along with the smaller size of these politburos, allowed Stalin to turn his cabinet into a responsive and adaptable instrument of governance under his personalist rule (see also: Gregory & Naimark 2008).

The Politburo was remolded and adapted with each CPSU Secretary-General, and while it "subjected the whole of the USSR to its ruthless dictatorship, but itself bowed time and again to the leader of its own making" (Löwenhardt et al. 1992) unavoidably, the Politburo was dissolved along with the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991. For its evolution, see Löwenhardt et al. 1992; older works are: Rigby 1972; Laird 1986.

In other communist countries, such as China (政治局 – Zhèngzhìjú – 'political bureau') or Eastern European, Caucasian and Central Asian states, equivalent terms were used during their communist periods (in German: Politbüro in Spanish: Politburó, both derived from Russian). In those regimes, similar bodies also existed with comparable functions.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Politburo: The Engine of Communist Rule, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Gorlizki, Y., 2007. Stalin's cabinet: the Politburo and decision making in the post-war years. In The Soviet Union, Waldran, P., ed., Routledge.
Gregory, P.R. and Naimark, N. eds., 2008. The lost politburo transcripts: from collective rule to Stalin's dictatorship. Yale University Press.
Laird, R.D., [1986] 2019. The Politburo: demographic trends, Gorbachev, and the future. Routledge.
Löwenhardt, J., Ozinga, J.R. and Van Ree, E., [1992] 2024. The rise and fall of the Soviet Politburo. Routledge.
Rigby, T.H., 1972. The Soviet politburo: A comparative profile 1951-71. Soviet Studies, 24:1.

Loxton, J. and Mainwaring, S., eds., Cambridge University Press.

Magaloni, B. and Kricheli, R., 2010. Political order and one-party rule. Annual review of political science, 13:1.

Martins, V., 2017. Politics of power and hierarchies of citizenship in Angola. Citizenship Studies, 21:1.

Metz, S., 1996. Reform, conflict, and security in Zaire. Strategic Studies Institute (SSI).

Morgenbesser, L., 2019. Cambodia's transition to hegemonic authoritarianism. Journal of Democracy, *30:*1.

Robinson, K., 2024. What is Hamas? Council on Foreign Relations (CFR).

Sartori, G., 1976. Parties and party systems: Volume 1: a framework for analysis. Cambridge University Press.

Schedler, A., ed., 2006. The Logic of Electoral Authoritarianism: The Dynamics of Unfree Elections. Lynne Rienner Publishers.

Smith, B., 2005. Life of the party: The origins of regime breakdown and persistence under single-party rule. World politics, 57:3.

Snegovaya, M. and McGlynn, J., 2024. Dissecting Putin's regime ideology. Post-Soviet Affairs.

Tan, N., 2015. Institutionalized succession and hegemonic party cohesion in Singapore. Party system institutionalization in Asia: Democracies, autocracies, and the shadows of the past, Hicken, A. and Martinez Kuhonta, E., eds., Cambridge University Press.

Tertiitsky, F., 2016. A history of North Korea's party congresses – what should we expect? The Guardian.

Tsebelis, G., 2000. Veto players and institutional analysis. Governance, 13:4.

Tucker, R.C., 1965. The dictator and totalitarianism. World Politics, 17:4.

Police Forces in Dictatorships

A particularly important link of the socialist state, the apparatus of the 'front line' – the Citizens' Militia
– General Wojciech Jaruzelski, dictator of the Polish People's Republic (1981)

There are many types of dictatorships, and the line separating them is often blurred, especially as they can evolve/devolve into other forms (Wahman et al. 2013; Lidén 2014). Therefore, there is no single, specific way in which dictatorships deal with policing. However, all cases are characterized by the fact that dictatorships distort the role of law enforcement. Unlike their democratic counterparts, dictatorships' police forces are exceedingly politicized and straightforwardly coercive. Since "the quality of policing is the quality of ruling" (Marenin 1985: 101), the way the dictatorships' police operate constitutes a key statement of its very nature.

DEFINITION Police forces are paramilitary public institutions responsible for enforcing the law, protecting people's lives, health and possessions, preventing and combating crime, and maintaining public security. They can be divided into main (primary, regular), sectoral (e.g., border guard, customs police, fiscal police, military police), specialized (e.g., railroad police, agencies responsible for VIP security or combating specific types of crime), and auxiliary (various supporting institutions, including that of voluntary or part-time nature). In countries where religion has a direct impact on the legal system, especially Islamic states, there may also be official religious police (morality police) responsible for enforcing customary principles. This should not be confused with vice squads, which are common types of police units that deal with crime associated with 'immoral' offenses, such as pornography, prostitution, gambling and psychoactive substances. Police are uniformed institutions, but not all officers operate in uniforms. Some law enforcement duties require the ability to 'blend in with the crowd,' such as criminal investigation units, patrolling using unmarked police cars, or sting operations (undercover work or covert operations). This form of policing is called 'plainclothes law enforcement.'

Typically, in unitary states there is one nationwide main police force and other agencies, which are all subordinated to the central government. Nationwide police activities can be complemented by other police-like institutions, subordinated to local governments (municipal police or guards), whereas in countries with a federal system of government, there are several separate law enforcement entities, with various levels of government (states, provinces, regions, cantons, units, counties, municipalities, cities) overseeing their agencies. In the federal model, the central law enforcement institutions are typically responsible for combating major offenses, such as transnational organized crime.

Modern police agencies began to take shape in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Their evolution in the twentieth century was different in democratic and non-democratic states. The functioning of police services is illustrated by many theoretical models, describing both their modus operandi (placement on the repressive-preventive axis or policing by consent versus policing by coercion) and the way they are organized (e.g., concentration versus deconcentration). What characterizes police forces of fascist, communist and other oppressive regimes is their orientation toward repressiveness and strict centralization.

Police forces of non-democratic regimes perform two types of functions. The first includes activities typical for every law enforcement agency (LEA), regardless of historical or geographical conditions and the type of regime, such as combating criminal misdemeanors and felonies, traffic enforcement, patrol service and riot police. The second type of function is political. Even though police officers of non-democratic regimes are primarily involved in typical policing, their relationship with society is distorted. The institutions' priorities are turned upside down, as 'serving and protecting' is possible as long as it is reconcilable with the bounds of service to the dominant group or authority. If it goes beyond that, the interest of the dominant group or authority takes precedence. This is usually openly expressed in the police oaths, in which loyalty to various ideological principles is emphasized first, whereas serving society comes second. For example, officers of the infamous Deutsche Volkspolizei (German People's Police), the national police in East Germany during the first postwar decade, swore to be loyal to the 'socialist fatherland,' and citizens were mentioned only in the third sentence of the oath (Burkhardt 2000: 162). In the Soviet Union, the oath emphasized the prevailing ideology: "I, a citizen of the USSR, hereby taking the oath of the Soviet Militsiya, do solemnly swear that I will serve faithfully to the end the Soviet people, Soviet homeland and Soviet government" (Lucas 2013: 268).

SEE ALSO Please note that this chapter is dedicated to the criminal police, and it does not discuss the role of political police (secret police) in dictatorships. The secret police deals with the security and interests of the state (political crimes or crimes against the state), and hence, it is a part (or a function) of intelligence services and is examined in a corresponding entry. As the functions of LEAs and intelligence services are indelibly intertwined, it is recommended to read this chapter alongside the one dedicated to intelligence apparatuses (see – intelligence services).

ORIGIN According to most popular interpretation, the term 'police' derives from the Greek word 'πολιτεία' and the Latin word 'pŏlītīa' ('state,' 'government,' or 'constitution'). The French lawyer Nicolas de La Mare (1639-1723) is often cited as the author of the first theoretical work devoted to the police: the four-volume Traité de la Police – more specifically, it covers the various functions of public administration. However, there were other concepts and traditions already in place, most notably the German Polizeiordnung. Until the nineteenth century, when modern police institutions were established, the term was used to name all activities concerning the enforcement of state's laws (the classical function of the state, cf. Habermas 2008). It is no coincidence that the formation of modern police, which took over loose local militias and citizen guards, coincides with the emergence and spread of nation-states in the late eighteenth century. The Metropolitan Police Act of 1829, orchestrated by Sir Robert Peel, the British home secretary, is considered to be the first legislation establishing a modern police force. (Hence, in the UK the police are still referred to as 'bobbies' (from Robert).) In Asia, the first LEA was established during the same period in British-controlled Singapore and Hong Kong. Western solutions quickly began to replace traditional Asian institutions, e.g., the Japanese samurai police. However, some local characteristics have survived to this day and, in turn, are the subject of inspiration in Europe (such as kōban (交番), a small station effective in Japanese community policing).

KEY SIGNIFICANCE LEAs (and intelligence services) play such a big role in dictatorships, and their control over citizens' lives can take on such a large scale that some regimes are often called 'police states,' which can be perceived as a definitional alternative for terms such as 'totalitarian,' 'fascist,' or 'authoritarian' (Seri 2013: 125; Tipton 2013: 13-16). Determining the boundaries between two dichotomous concepts, authoritarian policing (AP) and democratic policing (DP), is not as undemanding as it may seem. Typically, AP is defined simply as the antithesis of DP, but this does not exhaust the problem. In some specific cases, it may be considered whether DP is at all possible under dictatorship, with Singapore being one of the examples (Tan 2023). Hualing Fu and Weitseng Chen (2023: 5-8) made a convincing attempt to sort out this issue. They singled out the most important property of DP: 'police neutrality,' which in turn is associated with 'professionalism,' 'institutional autonomy,' comprehensive control mechanisms, democratic accountability and 'operating within the framework of the rule of law.' Following their line of reasoning, I argue that the main characteristics of police forces in dictatorships are (A) politicization, (B) militarization, (C) lack of accountability, (D) lack of transparency, (E) repressiveness and (F) excessive size.

Politicization (A) refers to the distorted relationship between LEAs and power structures. For dictatorial police, the main point of reference is not the state apparatus or the general social interest but the dictator, junta, or ruling party. Often, this connection has its origin in the very installment of the dictatorship, which relies on the support of previous systems' key public institutions, including (at least part of) the army and the police (Dunnage 2007: 112-113). Even before taking power, the elites of the future dictatorship may infect the existing security services by filling them with their supporters and slowly taking them over from the inside. After gaining power, the replacement of the entire police force (several or tens of thousands of people) and the formation of new services completely from scratch is most often unfeasible. Thus, there are attempts to co-opt representatives of the 'old order,' combined with rebranding, structural reforms, changes in subordination, or creating competing services, based on the 'divide and conquer' principle (cf. coup-proofing). If the dictatorship is established after a devastating war, the situation is more straightforward because there is little to nothing left of the previous police (like in Hungary or Poland after World War II). Often, the creation of new services is associated with deep purges among the officers of the 'old world.' The case of the Romanian police is particularly glaring. When the Romanian People's Republic was established after the war, the communists created the General Directorate of Militia, replacing two 'bourgeois' institutions: the 'Police' and the 'Gendarmerie.' Four years after the communists took over and two years after the Militia was created, only 1% of its officers still derived from former institutions (Şinca 2014: 7).

No dictatorship could be established without the police, nor can it last without it. A dictator can do without the public's legitimacy but not without the support of the police. Consequently, the genuine issue of authoritarian control for the dictator is not the declining legitimacy among the population but the fact that such dissatisfaction spreads and "begins to infect the elites tied to the regime itself," including law enforcement (Fukuyama 1992: 16).

As police forces are one of the fingers in 'the armed fist' of any dictatorship, their professional independence is limited. Unlike their democratic counterparts, they tend to be at least partially fused with political organizations' structures, ministries, intelligence services, or military apparatus. Some glaring examples are the Police of communist Poland and the Citizens' Militia (Milicja Obywatelska), which was partly merged with the Ministry of the Interior and the political police. The police of the Czechoslovak Socialist Republic, the 'Public Security' (Veřejná bezpečnost in Czech, Verejná bezpečnosť in Slovak), which was one of the branches of the National Security Corps. The 'Carabiniers of Chile' (Carabineros de Chile) gained military status after the 1973 coup d'état that ousted S. Allende and brought A. Pinochet to power. The 'General Police Corps' (Cuerpo General de Policía) of Francoist Spain performed both the function of the criminal and political police.

The Russian primary police force has operated under dictatorship conditions for most of the last hundred years. After its founding in 1917, the Workers' and Peasants' Militsiya (милиция) abetted the establishment of the Bolshevik dictatorship of Vladimir Lenin. Soon after, it became a tool of the genocidal, totalitarian dictatorship of Joseph Stalin, later of the communist one-party state, and eventually, it became one of the pillars of Vladimir Putin's 'informational autocracy' (Treisman 2018). The Soviet Union was, deservedly so, labeled 'the world's largest-ever police state' (Kotkin 2003: 173). In the beginning, the Militsiya was "little more than an adjunct to the political police: cops became spies" (Galeotti 1997: 142). However, it underwent significant changes as intelligence services grew larger. Louise I. Shelley argues, "Under Lenin and Stalin, the militia's political functions took precedence over the maintenance of social and economic control. Khrushchev de-Stalinized by shifting militia priorities away from political functions to crime control and economic policing" (Shelley 1990: 501). In 2011, the force went through rebranding and was replaced by the 'Police of Russia.' In general, however, little has changed. In 2012, Mark Galeotti (2012) wondered "whether Putin is willing to do more than simply discipline and centralise the police and admit the possibility that sometimes even the Kremlin must be constrained by the law." More than a decade later, after multiple incidents of police officers brutalizing peaceful protesters opposing the Russian invasion of Ukraine, it is clear what the answer is.

Instantly after a dictatorship is installed, the prevailing ideology (if any) is pumped into the bloodstream of law enforcement, which is reflected not only in organizational changes but also in naming conventions, professional holidays, insignia, commemorative plaques, monuments and revered heroes. It is often accompanied by rewriting history or copying the 'good practices' of fraternal dictatorships (Grossheim 2018). There is a full-scale 'fascistization' ('communization,' 'Nazification,' 'anti-communization,' etc.) of the institution, which fundamentally alters the police culture. Jonathan Dunnage (2012: 37) appropriately captures the essence of the process describing interwar Italy: "In the mid-1920s, members of the Italian police forces became guardians of an authoritarian state and fascist civilisation in the making."

One of the particularly interesting and alarming phenomena concerning law enforcement is the process of militarization (B) of the police, i.e., the implementation of military procedures, practices and equipment into policing. It can be present in democratic countries (Phillips 2018), but dictatorships are particularly known for such transformation. In military regimes, the lines between the armed forces and the police are 'often blurred.' In some cases, the police become 'subsumed by the military, rather than operating as a parallel security unit.' Sometimes, LEAs are "rendered powerless and subordinate, but usually the police institution itself is militarized, with military officers assuming a policing role. As a result, the police operate with a military mindset, prioritizing national security and regime survival over public safety." (Frantz 2018: 3.).

During the rule of the Government Junta of Chile (1973-1990), it happened on such a scale that police forces became 'the poor cousins of the military regime' (Dammert 2006: 61). In Brazil, the dictatorship (1964-1985) centralized the security apparatus, linked the police to the army, and made the 'Military Police' (Polícia Militar) similar to its civilian counterpart. In Francoist Spain (1936-1975), the military took control over all elements of law enforcement, the newly established main institutions, the 'General Police Corps,' and quasi-municipal police – the 'Armed and Traffic Police Corps' (municipal police) (Arango 2018: 79; Del Clot 2023: 36-37). After the unification of Germany in the second half of the nineteenth century, a federal system was introduced, and the member states kept their own police forces. By 1936, they were all absorbed into the newly formed 'Order Police' (Ordnungspolizei), as Adolf Hitler decided to 'unify the control of police duties in the Reich.' The position of chief of German Police was given to Heinrich Himmler, Reichsführer (chief) of the 'Protection Squadron' (Schutzstaffel – SS – ᛋᛋ in Armanen Runes) (Broszat 2014: 274). Consequently, as Bob Carruthers (2014: 366) explains, the 'Order Police' became formal members of the SS when, by ministerial directive, they were granted ranks in the SS commensurate with their police rank. Non-military or hybrid dictatorships often follow this path as well, e.g., by significantly expanding riot police and assigning military personnel to oversee law enforcement.

All elements of a dictatorship's security apparatus, including police forces, perform a diagnostic-preventive function. The law enforcement agencies of non-democratic regimes are responsible for analyzing public sentiment, uncovering and working against anti-system opposition alongside intelligence services. Typically, in authoritarian dictatorships, this type of function is focused on groups and individuals actively working to undermine the system, whereas under totalitarianism, everyone who, for whatever reason, is perceived as 'different' can be recognized as a threat.

This includes, among others, youth subcultures, especially counterculture movements, as well as sexual, religious and ethnic minorities. Crusades against various internal or external enemies, who are manufactured or exaggerated and demonized, are fought with no end in sight and with no intention of finding it. Perpetual conflict and the fear it generates are what fuels such dictatorships, providing it with a purpose and ways to discipline or mobilize the public. Therefore, if an 'us-versus-them' mentality is built and the socio-political reality is presented as a 'dog-eat-dog world' (Norris & Inglehart 2019: 444), security and the institutions responsible for maintaining it become particularly important.

The intensity of those processes varies from case to case, depending on the regime's scope of interest. Authoritarian regimes (authoritarianism) focus on controlling the public space. They are generally satisfied with the passive obedience of society (hence their focus on suppressing the public). In contrast, totalitarian regimes are equally interested in the individual's private life and upbringing, with the utopian goal of constructing a new society (hence their focus on mass mobilization) (Cohen 2015: 40). However, in dealing with those matters; usually, intelligence services lead the way, and the police perform an auxiliary or executive function.

The focus on coercion and submission to the will of the dictator causes a serious obstacle in building and maintaining public trust. The intelligence services and the military can, to some extent, manage without it, but for the police services, this kind of deficit is devastating. Lack of trust cuts police officers off from information, forcing them to reach for clandestine ways of obtaining it: surveillance and confidential human sources. Only superficially, this makes for a sufficient alternative: no police force can function effectively without the support of ordinary people who report crime, point out problems and offer advice. Subsequently, a vicious circle is created: the more the police rely on wiretaps and criminal informants, the less trust it generates. Soon, the patrolled streets begin to resemble an occupied territory, and police cars seem like the occupying force. The sound of a police siren is no longer associated with 'the help is on the way' but rather with 'trouble is coming;' someone is going to be searched, battered or arrested. Even Leon Trotsky (1993: 32) pointed out in 1934: "Without the support of the masses, the militia is nothing."

Since a dictator's survival relies heavily on the police's support, he must ensure that only 'trustworthy' people are recruited into service. Thus, political criteria play a key role in the police recruitment process. Although the formal affiliation of rank-and-file police officers to the dominant group, movement or party is not necessarily required, it is obligatory to accept its 'principles.' However, middle and top management positions are reserved for people closely and actively associated with the dominant group. Any dictatorship pays much attention to police education and its training system, saturating the materials with appropriate content and thus ensuring that vital 'principles' will be deeply rooted in the minds of new officers.

As installing and maintaining a dictatorship is impossible without the support of LEAs, the regime tries to keep its police officers content by generously distributing tangible and intangible goods. The police, along with the ruling party, intelligence services, economic, administrative and military apparatus, is often perceived as a significant vehicle of social advancement. The dictatorship does not abide by insubordination, but it is willing to tolerate police misconduct or, on some occasions, actively encourage it (Esparza 2022). Police officers, especially at the middle and top levels, can count on more or less formalized opportunities to exclude themselves from the legal system. Disregarding various pathologies, cover-ups and other forms of working above and around the legal system is not a system defect, but a feature.

The asymmetry in compliance with the law is tied to the weakening or even complete elimination of non-political accountability (C). Civil administration, courts, prosecutor offices and the media, even if they are formally entitled to do so, do not carry out real, substantive supervision and control over LEAs. Rather, they are, to a greater or lesser extent, part of the same process and play their roles adequately. This creates a specific form of loyalty of officers, not necessarily based on ideology, fear or genuine admiration, but rather on common interest. Once the dictatorship has been solidified and the revolutionary fervor that led to its installation has faded, mundane issues begin to come into play. As long as the dictatorship provides steady work, attractive wages, prestige and at least partial protection from criminal responsibility, it can count on the support of its 'iron fist.' However, this situation is challenging for the dictatorship itself. As the police are, both internally and externally, perceived as a privileged group, separated from society, self-centered and self-contained, demoralization inevitably takes hold. This may lead to a 'double-edged sword' situation: due to its special position, the security apparatus can usurp the right to be a parallel center of power, even threatening the dictator himself. Studies show that in the years 1946-2010, dictatorships collapsed primarily through coups (35%), followed by elections (26%) and popular uprisings (17%) (Geddes et al. 2018: 179). However, this observation applies primarily to intelligence services and the military, as they are closer to state affairs than regular law enforcement agencies are (see – intelligence services). Police forces' actions during coups can have significant implications for the outcome and the level of violence and repression experienced by the population, but they usually play second violin to the actions of the armed forces.

In democracies, transparency (D) is one of the features that distinguishes law enforcement from intelligence agencies. As institutions with close, daily and direct contact with the public, the former is much more open about their procedures than the latter. This applies to dictatorships as well, but to a much lesser extent. Typically, the public's knowledge of police services is limited. Even basic information, such as the number of officers, is considered sensitive and kept confidential. The aim is to create the impression of greatness and omnipotence of the apparatus, which is supposed to function as a deterrent. Ubiquitous, multidimensional propaganda reinforces this impression. Regardless of whether it is the military dictatorship in Brazil or the communist dictatorship in Poland, the mechanism is similar. As dictatorships do not tolerate a free press, it is practically impossible for the public to obtain reliable information on the state and the problems and proceedings of LEAs. As mentioned higher, supervision by the state's external authorities is also limited or non-existent. The communication conducted by the dictator's police is one-way only (Guerra 2016: 43-45). Undemocratic police do not feel the necessity to explain their actions, do not admit to any wrongdoings, and, as a matter of principle, do not apologize. Society is supposed to be a passive recipient of its messages, not a participant in the dialogue.

One of the defining features of dictatorships, which determines the shape of law enforcement, is overall repressiveness (E). The penal systems of dictatorships are characterized by harsh laws and the instrumental use of provisions, broadly defined and intentionally vague. Officially justified by the protection of security and public order, in practice, the goal of many hazy, oppressive regulations is to combat groups and individuals identified as 'dangerous' arbitrarily.

The strict law of dictatorships must be enforced accordingly. The forms, scale and justification of the use of force is one of the most controversial issues concerning any law enforcement. In dictatorships, it becomes even more challenging, as non-democratic states are infamous for excessive use of force and various human rights violations, including kidnapping, torture, enforced disappearances and death squads. Dictatorships often utilize the 'peace and order' slogan to justify police brutality and harsh punishment. The argument that living under an oppressive dictatorship has its downsides, but at least the regime guarantees greater public security, is dubious at best. While strict border control, widespread surveillance, a weapons monopoly and public fear can indeed reduce crime or at least improve the public's sense of security, it is no more than delaying the problem. The deep, systemic problems that dictatorships generate in the long run, such as inequality, exclusion and injustice, usually come to the fore sooner or later (Sá Motta 2022: 110). No matter how brutal and determined the police may be, it is not capable of solving social problems – only politics can.

To be effective in enforcing harsh laws, dictatorial police forces have an excessive size (F). They must be adequately large in terms of the number of stations, units and officers to exert control. To this end, dictatorships are eager to set up quasi-police, paramilitary auxiliary forces responsible for assisting the police in riot control, combating counter-revolutionary movements ('internal enemies') and performing functions such as civil defense or emergency management. (cf. paramilitaries) Examples include the Hilfspolizei (Nazi Germany), the 'Portuguese Legion' (under the Portuguese Estado Novo), Somatén Armado (the Francoist Spain), the 'Voluntary Militia for National Security' (Italy under Benito Mussolini's dictatorship), the 'Public Security Auxiliary Guard' and the 'People's Militias' (communist Czechoslovakia), or the 'Volunteer Reserve of the Citizens' Militia' (communist Poland). What deserves a separate mention is the Chinese case. The 'Chinese Communist Party' created the 'Militia' (民兵 – Mínbīng) to work alongside the 'People's Police' (national police force) and the 'People's Armed Police' (specialized military police). The exact size of the Militia is unknown, but official data are staggering. In 2010, the Beijing regime informed the world that it has eight million people serving in 'the primary militia' (Information Office of the SCIO 2011: 19) but did not comment on the second part of the institution: 'the general militia' which also should be counted in millions. This number is the result of many years of reforms that resulted in the Militia's size reduction. Back in 1957, the number of Chinese militiamen was estimated at thirty million (Dreyer 1982: 78).

Such militias are not state institutions per se but rather serve as the private guards of the dictator, the ruling party or junta and/or balance out the regular armed forces (cf. coup-proofing). During the establishment phase, when a dictator takes over, they are often engaged in combating the forces of the 'old order.' In the long term, they ensure that the society 'stays alert.' Eventually, those guards and militias become one of the elements of the militarization of social life, which is typical of dictatorships. The idea behind it is simple and effective: the more people serve the system, the more stable it is.

LITERATURE To understand the origins, nature and evolution of police forces, it is worth reaching for works such as The Evolution of Policing (De Guzman et al. 2013) and A Short History of Police and Policing (Emsley 2021). Particularly scarce and therefore especially valuable are works offering cross-sectional, comparative perspectives on the subject, such as The Politics of the Police (Reiner 2010), The Oxford Handbook of Police and Policing (Reisig & Kane 2014), Comparative Policing (de Maillard 2022) or Regime Type and Beyond (Chen & Fu 2023); and those approaching the issue from a different angle, such as Police Forces: a Cultural History of an Institution (Mladek 2007) or Gender Inclusive Policing (Prenzler 2023). The trials and tribulations of contemporary policing have been presented in a thought-provoking way in Shielded (Schwartz 2023) or America on Fire (Hinton 2021).

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES All security institutions, even in the most transparent full democracies, are to some degree hermetic and exclusive. As a substantial portion of relevant data is considered 'sensitive,' the basic problem related to the scientific inquiries on police services concerns limited access to source materials. Conducting participant observation, interviewing or surveying active LEA officers is possible but challenging. The general legal framework and basic information are easily accessible, but internal procedures are at least partially classified. Researchers interested in studying police culture or socio-political preferences of officers are not necessarily welcomed with open arms by the management.

In non-democratic states, which are significantly less transparent than democracies, the problem is all the greater. As long as the dictatorship exists, conducting in-depth scientific inquiries, both domestic and external, on its law enforcement is out of the question, and researchers are reduced to scratching the surface. Some valuable insights may come from whistle-blowers, defectors, refugees, or independent investigative journalists, but it is insufficient to conduct comprehensive, comparative research. For example, little to none can be said about law enforcement in the Democratic People's Republic of Korea or about the General Command of the Law Enforcement of the Islamic Republic of Iran and its predecessors (see Alasti 2023: 220-222).

Typically, the regime conducts its own 'research,' glorifying its services and condemning 'anti-system forces.' It shapes a bizarre esprit de corps within the framework of a bunker mentality – no one understands the regime but the regime itself. The scarce materials that dictatorships do make available to the public are often deliberately misleading. For dictatorships, lying to the public is "a matter of systematic policy" (Wolin 2017: 261). This is even more so when it comes to issues of existential significance for its survival, such as crime rates, identified threats and the morale among the officers.

Some countries that have undergone democratization (for example, the Czech Republic, Germany, Hungary, Poland, Romania, Slovakia, Spain, and Ukraine) have established national memory institutions responsible for researching and documenting their non-democratic past, as well as sharing surviving source materials with the public. The establishment of such institutions contributed to the development of knowledge about law enforcement in dictatorships. However, the usefulness of these resources is limited by two factors. First, it is standard practice for dictatorships to dispose or privatize records of their oppressive, often illegal practices, which results in archives being largely incomplete. Second, the source materials that did survive should be studied especially carefully and critically, as, due to notorious false accounting, tampering with evidence and the propaganda of success, they do not necessarily reflect the actual state of affairs.

A particular type of methodological challenge concerns the necessity to keep scientific inquiries free from moralizing judgments and overgeneralizing. Obviously, all dictatorial police forces should be condemned, but they should not be equated. This remark applies to both international and domestic comparative studies. Even in a dictatorship's police, there are units performing duties unrelated to the type of regime, such as traffic control or chasing down common criminals. Hence, a generalized negative opinion about a dictatorship's police, to which the researcher is entitled or even obligated, should not lead to equal condemnation of all people serving in it. Most specifically, studying the roles of police in autocracies should not turn into a generalized critique of law enforcement as a whole. Not necessarily "All cops are beautiful" (Constantinou 2021: 5-16), but certainly not "all police is conning bastards" (Brogden 1981: 202-228).

NEW FRONTIERS Dictatorships are known to be especially eager to utilize technological innovations. Currently, one of the most important fields of change in policing concerns the acquisition and processing of personal data, which is best exemplified by mobile tracking systems, digitalization of public services and biometric identifiers. Never in history has access to information on citizens been so cheap, simple, and comprehensive. Furthermore, it is subject to constant automation. These innovations have led to the creation of new terms, such as the 'electronic police state,' 'digital authoritarianism,' or 'digital totalitarianism' (Filimowicz 2022). The process poses a serious challenge to civil liberties and, as such, should be considered in the context of civilian oversight of law enforcement. Obviously, dictatorships do not consider this as a problem, and focus on maximizing such benefits. The rise of smart cities packed with hyper-surveillance features, such as facial recognition systems, will have a tremendous impact on law enforcement, not only embracing racial profiling but also leading to its automation (Joh 2022) and the dehumanization of policing (Jackson 2020). Among the dictatorships, communist China is particularly active in the area of mass surveillance, with its unprecedented flagship project – the 'Social Credit System' (社会信用体系 – shèhuì xìnyòng tǐxì). Hence the term 'the perfect police state' (Cain 2021).

Global freedom has been declining for 17 consecutive years (Freedom House, 2023). As democratic backsliding continues, the properties of non-democratic law enforcement will spread. This applies both to countries with a long democratic tradition as well as to those that have gone from dictatorship to democracy in the last few decades. Already, there are claims that some democratic states are becoming disturbingly similar to dictatorships when it comes to their policing. This is best exemplified by law enforcement in the United States, which in recent years has been the subject of numerous works regarding militarization, violence, civil forfeiture, no-knock raids, double standards and lack of accountability (Hinton 2021; Aiello 2023). The question raised in the literature about whether DP is possible in authoritarian regimes can be easily reversed: is AP possible in democracies? Further reflection on what constitutes a democratic police is needed, and this makes it all the more essential to conduct comprehensive, comparative and longitudinal studies.

An interesting issue that is not given enough attention, especially in the form of detailed comparative analysis, is the long shadow of dictatorship looming over some LEAs (one of the noteworthy exceptions: Chen & Fu 2023). The post-dictatorship police services go through democratization and various adaptive changes, but the question remains if those transformations are solid and profound or come down to superficial matters, such as colors of the uniforms or phraseology (see also: authoritarian legacies). Maria Pia Guerra, who studied the legacy of 'the National Security Doctrine,' which was adopted during the civil-military dictatorship in Brazil, concludes that "Just as in the dictatorship, the police continue to be conceived as bodies for the defence of the State, not as bodies for the protection of society. The citizen is not perceived as someone who receives a public service, but is suspected of breaking the political-social order, a potential criminal." (2016: 115). Similar conclusions emerge after taking a closer look at the police forces of some post-communist countries.

The democratization of the post-dictatorship police is a long, complicated endeavor that must go beyond the modification of legal provisions. In order to be successful, it must include changes in internal procedures and, above all, constructing a new police training model. Building and maintaining trust in law enforcement in post-non-democratic countries requires overcoming prejudices and stereotypes related to the past. Even decades after the dictatorship collapses, society remembers the injustices inflicted by the police, especially since its victims are publicly commemorated. This evokes parallels and controversies, chiefly in situations of high-profile police scandals and times of social unrest.

The anti-police sentiment remains present in some post-non-democratic societies. After hundreds of people who voted in the 2017 Catalan independence referendum were jostled and injured by the riot police, one Barcelona resident commented: "The police is the same as the time of Franco, only they had horses back then." (Horowitz 2017). Studying the role of LEAs in dictatorships is not only a historical endeavor but a very current necessity, especially given the fact that democratic backsliding continues throughout the world. The quality of policing and civil-police relations should not be discussed solely in the context of reducing crime and civil liberties but also as one of the most important indicators of a state's condition.

How to cite:

Nyzio, Arkadiusz, 2025. Police Forces in Dictatorships, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Aiello, T., 2023. The Routledge History of Police Brutality in America.

Alasti, S., 2023. The Criminal Justice System of Iran, in Comparative Criminal Justice: International Trends and Practices. Rowman & Littlefield.

Arango, E.R., 2018. Spain: democracy regained. Routledge.

Brogden, M., 1981. 'All Police are Conning Bastards' – Policing and the Problem of Consent. In Law, State and Society, Croom Helm.

Broszat, M. 2014. The Hitler State. Routledge.

Burkhardt, A., 2000. Militär- und Polizeihochschulen in der DDR. Wissenschaftliche Dokumentation. HoF-Arbeitsbericht, 2.

Cain, G., 2021. The Perfect Police State: An Undercover Odyssey into China's Terrifying Surveillance Dystopia of the Future. Public Affairs.

Carruthers, B., 2014. The SS on Trial: Evidence from Nuremberg. Pen and Sword.

Clark, W.R., Golder, M. and Golder, S.N., 2019. Foundations of Comparative Politics, Thousand Oaks & CQ Press.

Cohen, J., 2015. The Private Life: Why We Remain in the Dark. Counterpoint.

Dammert, L., 2006. From Public Security to Citizen Security in Chile, In Public Security and Police Reform in the Americas. The University of Pittsburgh Press.

De Guzman, M.C., Das, A.M. and Das, D.K., eds. 2013. The Evolution of Policing: Worldwide Innovations and Insights. CRC Press.

de Maillard, J., 2022. Comparative Policing. Taylor & Francis.

Del Clot, D., 2023. Lawfare – Judicial Warfare in Spain: The Strategy of Repression Against the Catalan Independence Movement. Liverpool University Press.

Dreyer, J.T., 1982. The Chinese Militia: Citizen-Soldiers and Civil-Military Relations in the People's Republic of China, Armed Forces and Society, 9:1.

Dunnage, J., 2006. Policing Right-Wing Dictatorships: Some preliminary comparisons of Fascist Italy, Nazi Germany and Franco's Spain. Crime, Histoire & Sociétés/Crime, History & Societies, 10:1.

Dunnage, J., 2007. Mussolini's Policemen, 1926-43, In Policing Interwar Europe. Continuity, Change and Crisis, 1918-40. Palgrave Macmillan.

Dunnage, J., 2012. Mussolini's Policemen: Behaviour, Ideology and Institutional Culture in Representation and Practice. Manchester University Press.

Emsley, C., 2021. A Short History of Police and Policing. Oxford University Press.

Esparza, D., 2022. Policing and Politics in Latin America: When Law Enforcement Breaks the Law. Lynne Rienner Publishers.

Filimowicz, M., ed., 2022. Digital Totalitarianism: Algorithms and Society. Routledge.

Frantz, E., 2018. The Legacy of Military Dictatorship: Explaining Violent Crime in Democracies. International Political Science Review, 40:3.

Freedom House, 2023. Freedom in the World.

Fu, H. and Chen, W., 2023. Mapping the Authoritarian and Democratic Divide: The Transformation of Policing in Asia, In Regime Type and Beyond: The Transformation of Police in Asia. Cambridge University Press.

Fukuyama, F., 1992. The End of History and the Last Man. Free Press.

Galeotti, M., 1997. Cops, Spies and Private Eyes – Changing Patterns of Russian Policing: A Review Article. Europe-Asia Studies, 49:1.

Galeotti, M., 2012. Purges, Power and Purpose: Medvedev's 2011 police reforms. The Journal of Power Institutions in Post-Soviet Societies, 13.

Geddes, B., Wright, J. and Frantz, E. 2018. How Dictatorships Work Power, Personalization, and Collapse. Cambridge University Press.

Grossheim, M., 2018. The 'sword and shield of the party': How the Vietnamese People's Public Security Forces Portray Themselves. Intelligence and national security, 33:3.

Guerra, M.P., 2016. Polícia e Ditadura: Arquitetura Institucional da Segurança Pública de 1964 a 1988. Ministério da Justiça/Comissão de Anistia.

Habermas, J., 2008. The Constitutionalization of International Law and the Legitimation Problems of a Constitution for World Society. Constellations, 15:4.

Hinton, E., 2021. America on Fire: The Untold History of Police Violence and Black Rebellion Since the 1960s. Liveright.
Horowitz, J., 2017. In Catalonia Independence Push, Policing Becomes Politicized. The New York Times.
Information Office of the State Council of the People's Republic of China (SCIO). 2011. China's National Defense in 2010.
Jackson, R.D., 2020. 'I approved it... and I'll do it again': Robotic Policing and its Potential for Increasing Excessive Force, In Societal Challenges in the Smart Society. Universidad de La Rioja.
Joh, E.E., 2022. The Unexpected Consequences of Automation in Policing. The SMU Law Review, 75:3.
Kotkin, S., 2003. Armageddon Averted: the Soviet Collapse, 1970-2000. Oxford University Press.
Lidén, G., 2014. Theories of Dictatorships: Sub-Types and Explanations. Studies of Transition States and Societies, 6:1.
Lucas, E., 2013. Deception: Spies, Lies and how Russia Dupes the West. Bloomsbury.
Marenin, O., 1985. Police Performance and State Rule: Control and Autonomy in the Exercise of Coercion. Comparative Politics, 18:1.
Mladek, K., 2007. Police Forces: a Cultural History of an Institution. Palgrave Macmillan.
Norris, P. and Inglehart, R., 2019. Cultural Backlash: Trump, Brexit, and Authoritarian Populism. Cambridge University Press.
Phillips, D.L., 2017. An Uncertain Ally: Turkey under Erdogan's Dictatorship. Routledge.
Phillips, S.W., 2018. Police Militarization: Understanding the Perspectives of Police Chiefs, Administrators, and Tactical Officers. Routledge.
Prenzler, T., ed., 2023. Gender Inclusive Policing: Challenges and Achievements. Routledge.
Reiner, R., The Politics of the Police. Oxford University Press.
Reisig, M.D. and Kane, R.J., eds., 2014. The Oxford Handbook of Police and Policing. Oxford University Press.
Sá Motta, R., 2022. A Present Past: The Brazilian Military Dictatorship and the 1964 Coup. Liverpool University Press.
Schwartz, J., 2023. Shielded: How the Police Became Untouchable. Penguin.
Seri, G., 2013. Seguridad: Crime, Police Power, and Democracy in Argentina. Bloomsbury.
Shelley, L.I., 1990. Policing Soviet Society: The Evolution of State Control. Law & Social Inquiry, 15:3.
Şinca, F., 2014. Martirii Poliţiei Române. Distrugerea poliţiei sub regimul comunist. RCR Editorial Publishing House.
Tan, K.Y.L., 2023. Democratic Policing in an Authoritarian State? A Historical Look at Singapore, In Regime Type and Beyond: The Transformation of Police in Asia, Cambridge University Press.
The Economist Intelligence Unit, 2023. Democracy Index, 2022.
Tipton, E.K., 2013. The Japanese Police State Tokko in Interwar Japan. Bloomsbury Publishing.
Treisman, D., ed., 2018. The New Autocracy: Information, Politics, and Policy in Putin's Russia. Brookings Institution Press.
Trotsky, L., 1993. Fascism: What It Is and How to Fight It. Pathfinder Press.
Wahman, M., Teorell J. and Hadenius, A., 2013. Authoritarian Regime Types Revisited: Updated Data in Comparative Perspective. Contemporary Politics, 19:1.
Wintrobe, R., 2000. The Political Economy of Dictatorship. Cambridge University Press.
Wolin, S.S., 2017. Democracy Incorporated: Managed Democracy and the Specter of Inverted Totalitarianism. Princeton University Press.

Presidential Guards & Praetorians

Why do you quote laws to those of us with swords in our hands?
– Pompey (Gnaeus Pompeius Magnus, 106-48 BCE)

For a coup d'état to succeed, the leadership has to be taken in or taken out. Capturing the leader increases the likelihood that a coup attempt succeeds (Matthews 2023), and for this reason, the regime leadership requires additional protection. This is much more pronounced in dictatorships, where the risk of coups is higher and where assassination is also more likely than in democracies.

Throughout history, rulers have consistently relied on trusted military units for protection. In earlier times, rulers would lead their armies into battle, safeguarded by loyal regiments and specialized bodyguards. For instance, Alexander the Great depended on his 'companions,' a literal translation of hetairoi (ἑταῖροι). These were an elite cavalry unit and a crucial part of his military forces (shock troops). Its members were not only soldiers but also close friends and allies of Alexander, often drawn from Macedonian nobility. The most notable among them was Hephaestion, who was Alexander's closest friend and possibly his lover.

DEFINITION A presidential guard or equivalent can be defined as a specialized unit responsible for the protection and security of the executive leadership. This unit is often composed of elite personnel trained to ensure the safety of the president through various means, including physical protection, intelligence gathering, and strategic planning. Since rulers once tended to ride into battle themselves, this protection was drawn from elite military units; however, in democracies today, they often recruit from law enforcement. Note that sometimes paramilitaries can be used by (personalist) rulers for this exact purpose. In this case they can also be considered to be 'palace guards' despite not being recruited from the military or law enforcement.

The concept of a presidential guard has its roots in famous and notorious palace guards (in urbanized, sedentary polities) and even further in time in nomadic or itinerant rulers accompanied by their 'blood brothers' (their comitatus). Since the decoupling of military command and civilian rule (in line with the rise of professional armies) and the emergence of democracy, we find increasingly disparate variation in the constellation, mission and behavior of executive protection units in democratic and non-democratic regimes. For dictatorships, these units still exhibit similar behavior that can be traced back to the ancient bodyguards like the Praetorian Guard, infamous for their dual role as protectors and kingmakers.

ORIGINS The term 'praetorian' draws back to the praetoriani (the bodyguards of the praetorium or 'headquarters of a magistrate' in Latin), meaning the (in)famous Roman 'Praetorian Guards,' troops personally selected by top officials for personal protection. They were the archetypal 'palace guard' – drawn from the military – and allowed to carry weapons (but only in civilian dress (toga), ergo their name cohors togata) beyond the pomerium, the sacred boundary marking the inner sanctum of the city of Rome where the religious and political centers were located. Outside the inner city, other units such as the Vigiles (who functioned as both a police force and fire brigade) and city cohorts were also allowed to carry weapons, of course, but in the political heart of the empire, the praetorians owned the monopoly on violence.

SEE ALSO Note that the term 'praetorian' today has two meanings. Its oldest meaning goes back to the Roman palace guards, and is a group-label for such executive protection units through time. The second meaning is distilled from the same historical example's tendency to intervene in politics, especially succession, by becoming a key political player (as an armed institution), often acting as kingmakers. The label 'praetorian' in this sense has been applied more widely in military-civilian relations and is attributed to militaries as a whole that intervene in politics. Coup 'leaders' may be classified as praetorians (cf. coups), and military regimes' mission and behavior can be classified as such (depending on the scope and length of their intervention, cf. Nordlinger 1977). So, in the second case, the label is no longer attached to any particular protective unit but describes the interventionist nature of any military organization. To recap, at the peak of irony, presidential guards (descending from ancient praetorians) are still the most common solution (cf. coup-proofing) to protect the regime leadership from 'praetorian' enemies within the state.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Creating special security or palace guards presents inherent dilemmas. First of all, these solutions exacerbate the problems they are meant to solve: these protective units can drain military resources and demoralize regular troops due to better pay, equipment and training they receive, with lesser risk of being into combat. As (de facto) separate units, they pose a threat to the unity and hierarchy of command and control structures. For these reasons, they can actually trigger coups d'états, as happened in Mali in early 2012: Mali had been facing a resurgence of rebellion in its northern territories, led by the Tuareg rebels who sought greater autonomy. The Malian army, feeling overwhelmed and under-resourced, became increasingly dissatisfied with the government's handling of the conflict. This discontent culminated in a coup on 21 March 2012, when a group of low-ranking soldiers, led by Captain Amadou Sanogo, seized control of the government. The coup leaders expressed their frustration over the lack of support and resources provided to them for fighting the well-armed Tuareg forces. It did not help that elite protective troops (with necessary equipment) remained stationed near the capital and were not employed in the war effort.

Modern democracies typically avoid the creation of such guards from the military forces to maintain an egalitarian military ethos, as their existence can trigger inter-branch rivalry. Instead, democratic leaders rely on law enforcement agencies for executive security, with techniques and training, however, comparable to those of paratroopers and special forces.

EXAMPLES The protection of politicians throughout history has often involved the establishment of specialized organizations, with the level of protection directly impacting the potential costs for would-be attackers. The Praetorian Guard served the Roman senators and later emperors. This elite unit traces its origins back to at least the Scipio family and was operational until it was dissolved by Constantine I in 275 CE. The size of the Praetorian Guard varied over time, initially consisting of nine cohorts of 500 to 1000 men each under Emperor Augustus (Torgler & Frey 2012: 360). However, over time, the Praetorians became deeply involved in political affairs, often assassinating the very emperors they were meant to protect. The list of victims is long and includes Caligula (41 CE), Claudius (54 CE), Galba (69 CE), Vitellius (69 AD), Pertinax and Didius Julianus (both in 193 CE), Caracalla (217 CE), and Elagabalus (222 CE).

The praetorians are believed to have been involved in the murder of Commodus (192 CE) and Gordian III (244 CE), too, as co-conspirators. Didius Julianus became emperor immediately after Pertinax's assassination. He is infamous for having purchased the throne in an auction held by the Praetorian Guard, who had killed Pertinax for imposing discipline and reform on the unit. Didius Julianus was killed for not paying up. They were the first two victims in 193 CE, the 'year of five emperors.'

Similarly, the Janissaries (yeŋiçeri – 'new soldier') served as the household troops and bodyguards for the Ottoman sultans. Established in the fourteenth century, soldiers for this elite infantry regiment were recruited via Devşirme ('collecting' – a 'child levy' or blood tax) or the practice of forcible taking children from occupied Balkan (Christian) territories, converting them to Islam and training them into loyal slave-soldiers.

The concept of slave regiments has ancient roots, with the Mamluk system (where mamlūk means property) or Ghulām system (ghilmān, meaning slave boys) involving slave regiments and eunuchs who were trained and educated at the expense of their masters for roles in protection and administration in Persian and Islamic polities. The Ottomans, in particular, revived the Mamluk system, which enabled subsequent sultans to distance themselves from the unreliable 'blood brothers' of their fathers' original ghazi-retinue by supplanting the latter with their loyal armies. (The Mamluks were also cavalry regiments like traditional retinues) (Van den Bosch 2021: 413).

This recurring institution of slave mercenaries formed a distinct military caste across various regions, including the Middle East, Central Asia, and India, from the early ninth to the nineteenth century. Detached from their kin and tribes, these soldiers developed personal loyalty to their masters and received specialized training, making them one of the earliest systems of coup-proofing in pre-modern states. They held privileged positions and often shared in the wealth of their masters, whom they defended against both palace intrigues and battlefield threats. On (more than one) occasion, Mamluks seized supreme power and established dynasties, notably in Egypt from 1250 to 1517 and in India from 1206 to 1290 (Van den Bosch 2021: 413).

In the Ottoman Empire, the Janissaries were designed for exactly this purpose and became the largest military presence at court, with numbers fluctuating significantly over time, with a strength of 6,000 men in 1475 and reaching 113,000 men by the eighteenth century (Torgler & Frey 2012: 360).

Like their Roman counterparts, the Janissaries also became politically influential and were responsible for the assassination of rulers they were supposed to protect, such as Sultan Osman II in 1622. They acted as kingmakers, most often indirectly, meaning new sultans had to negotiate for their support and, at times, directly, e.g., by putting Mustafa IV on the throne in 1807. In any case, by the late seventeenth century, the Janissaries had become increasingly corrupt and less effective militarily. They were more interested in trade and artisanal activities than in maintaining their military discipline and prowess. The force was disbanded in 1826 by Sultan Mahmud II (Palmer 1953; Nicolle 1995; Goodwin 2014).

The Swiss Guard, officially the Pontifical Swiss Guard, has served as the pope's personal bodyguard since 1506, established by Pope Julius II. Their primary role is to protect the pope and his residence. Known for their military skill, Swiss mercenaries were historically sought after as elite bodyguards, leading to their recruitment by the Vatican. A significant moment in their history was during the Sack of Rome in 1527, when 147 guards died defending Pope Clement VII. (This event is commemorated annually on 6 May with the swearing-in of new recruits). Today, the Swiss Guard performs both ceremonial and security duties in Vatican City. They protect the pope during public appearances and events, wearing distinctive Renaissance-style uniforms. Despite their historical origins, they are a modern and well-trained force dedicated to serving the pope and the Catholic Church.

The Garde Impériale was formed in 1799 to protect the French consuls and gained prominence under Emperor Napoleon. It included various divisions, such as the Old Guard, Middle Guard, and Young Guard. This transition began at the Battle of Marengo on 14 June 1800, where the Guard played a critical role in battle. Napoleon recognized the need for a robust battlefield reserve, leading to several decrees that expanded the Guard's size and capabilities. In 1804, this force numbered 8,000 men, but by 1812, it included over 51,000 officers and men, comprising various infantry and cavalry regiments, artillery companies, and support units. The Guard acted as a strategic reserve during key battles such as Austerlitz, Jena, Eylau, and Borodino. (Their ultimate defeat occurred at Waterloo in 1815 when Napoleon sent them into battle in a desperate move to turn the tide in his favor) (Haythornthwaite 2012; Lachouque & Brown 2017).

In the twentieth century, Adolf Hitler's bodyguards saw themselves as modern-day praetorians. The Schutzstaffel – SS – ᛋᛋ in Armanen Runes) was established in 1920 as Hitler's personal guard. Initially limited to 280 personnel until 1929, it expanded significantly under Heinrich Himmler to include 52,000 men by 1932 and grew to encompass 250,000 men at the start of WWII, eventually forming 38 divisions during the war. Hitler's personal security was initially provided by the Leibstandarte SS Adolf Hitler (LSSAH) until it became part of the Waffen-SS during the war. Subsequently, his personal security duties were transferred to the Reichssicherheitsdienst (RSD) (Höhne 1979; Graber 1982; Hoffmann 1980, cited in Torgler & Frey 2012: 360-361). As dictatorships consolidate, these protective units grow in size and take on additional roles beyond merely guarding the ruler. War seems to be a catalyst for this trend: A notable example is the Waffen-SS and particularly Hitler's personal LSSAH regiment, which developed its own tank division, spearheaded most military campaigns as elite units and ended up working as a sort of 'fire brigade,' to counter allied attacks (Cox 2001: 3).

Similarly, Saddam Hussein's Iraqi Republican Guard (modeled after the SS) was a small force initially but expanded significantly during the Iran-Iraq War in the 1980s and became active in battle. Despite this expansion, a battalion always remained to protect Hussein. His son Qusay was in charge of the Amn al-Khas, the presidential security detail. Mobutu Sese Seko of Zaire also relied on soldiers from his hometown for his Presidential Security Division (Cox 2001: 3).

LITERATURE Executive protection units, palace guards or presidential guards, hereafter used interchangeably, are studied as individual case studies but seldom comparatively. From the examples above, it is clear that they all start as elite protective units. Due to their superiority, these units expand under non-democratic rule (revolutionary, totalitarian or just personalist), not only in size, as they have a strong tendency for mission creep, taking on additional responsibilities aimed at consolidating the regime or the leader's personalist rule. War seems to be an absolute catalyst for their expansion.

Dictators' reliance on such units creates a conundrum: while they are crucial for protection against assassination and coups d'état, their loyalty is often tied personally to the dictator. Moreover, this loyalty may not transfer well to successors, leading to friction and distrust. When successors are not able to control such units they inherit, the latter enters the inner sanctum of the regime as a political player. This is thus the moment when praetorians start acting praetorian and often become increasingly bold in their demands, often acting as kingmakers while their military effectiveness erodes over time. This probably is the effect of increased patronalism inside such units, where meritocracy is replaced by clientelism and personal networks.

These patterns are very visible in historical examples: both in tsarist Russia and the USSR, similar, almost cyclical trends can be observed. Under Ivan IV the Terrible (1530-1584), the streltsy (стрельцы – musketeers) were established as part of a standing army, as infantry units, typically armed with long guns (arquebuses, later muskets) and pollaxes. Initially made up of commoners, the streltsy evolved into a hereditary military caste by the mid-seventeenth century. They lived in distinct settlements known as slobody and were responsible for police and security tasks in Moscow and various border towns where they were stationed. Many also practiced trades and crafts. By 1681, the streltsy numbered around 55,000, with 22,500 based in Moscow. As a hereditary class, they guarded the tsars until they became too praetorian. They mingled into the succession dispute between Peter I (the Great) and his half-brother Ivan V but were unsuccessful in preventing Peter I from ascending the throne. After a series of uprisings during Peter's reign, he brutally suppressed their revolts and gradually disbanded them (Britannica 2011). Soon after, he selected and elevated his own loyal, protective units: the Preobrazhensky and Semenovsky regiments.

In time, these units also started influencing tsarist successions (supporting Katerina I, Elisabeth I, and Katerina II 'Catherine the Great'), and they continued to be relied upon even after the monarchy's fall by the transitional government (March to November 1917). During the October Revolution, these units were involved in various capacities but did not significantly intervene in power struggles (Cox 2001: 11-12).

The Bolsheviks established special units before forming the Red Army, like the Osobnogo Naznacheniya (особого назначения – 'special purpose' units, shortened to 'Осназ' – Osnaz) controlled by the Cheka (ЧК – an abbreviation for the Extraordinary Commission for Combating Counter-Revolution, Sabotage, and Speculation). These units were tasked with protection, but elite units also participated in suppressing uprisings (i.e., the Kronstadt and Basmachi rebellions) and executing opponents. (They were given the order to execute the tsar and his family). Lenin also relied on the Fourth Latvian Rifles regiment for Kremlin security after moving the capital to Moscow in March 1918 (Cox 2001: 12).

Under Stalin's regime, personal control over leadership security was intensified. The Osnaz became part of his new NKVD (НКВД – People's Commissariat for Internal Affairs), directly controlled by Stalin and notoriously headed by Genrikh Yagoda (1934-1936) and Nikolai Yezhov (1936-1938), who both perished after falling out of favor with the secretary-general. These units participated in special missions and internal (elite) purges. After Stalin died in 1953, the former head of the NKVD (1938-1946), Lavrentiy Beria (also an ethnic Georgian like Stalin), tried to take over the politburo but was eventually thwarted and executed (Cox 2001: 12-14).

Beria's attempted takeover exemplifies how personalized protection units could become praetorian when left leaderless. After Stalin's death, security responsibilities were once again divided among different apparatuses to prevent any single entity from wielding excessive power.

Table 8.2 shows the diverging role of ruler's personal guards in three types of armies (professional, praetorian (i.e., interventionist) and revolutionary) adhering to Amos Perlmutter's original classification.

Perlmutter's (1969; 1977) well-known typology highlights the varying logic of these three forms of armies, and his overview helps systematize the role and function of 'palace guards' in regimes with professional armies (consolidated democracies and some civilian dictatorships), praetorian regimes with a history of military interventions (military authoritarian regimes or unconsolidated democracies) and revolutionary (authoritarian and totalitarian) regimes. The categories are ideal types, and can partly overlap, but do expose the main differences.

In professional armies, executive protection units have only this main function. Their size matches the importance of those they protect and the threat level, mostly emanating from outside the regime. Threats are lower in democracies due to the number of veto players (Box 6.6) and term limits. These units are integrated into the regular structure of the armed forces and are most often established by law enforcement agencies (not the military). In the US, for instance, the US Secret Service plays this role. It is a federal law enforcement agency originally part of the Treasury Department but has been moved under the Department of Homeland Security since 2003. Presidents have no say in its recruitment and command structure.

In praetorian contexts where coups are likely, presidential guards or their equivalents are directly accountable to the ruler. Under personalist rule, they are often headed by a family member of the dictator. As regimes consolidate or with increased personalization, their functions move beyond coup-proofing. Especially as the regular armed forces are increasingly distrusted, under-equipped and purged, these loyal executive protection units are relied upon for special operations and personal missions set by the ruler. As long as the ruler is in power, they tend to be very loyal. The trouble starts after the ruler suddenly dies or is incapacitated, becomes a lame duck or is about to get ousted by mass protests. For instance, in 1999, routed by uprisings, the fleeing president of Niger, Ibrahim Baré Maïnassara, was shot by his presidential guard while attempting to board his plane at the airport. Soon after, its commander, Major Daouda Mallam Wanké took control of the country.

Table 8.2 – Types of Armies & Palace Guards

CATEGORIES		Professional Armies	Praetorian Armies	Revolutionary Armies
Main missions		Territorial defense against external enemies. Conquest and foreign operations.	Keep the regime in power. Protect it from external and internal enemies. Protect their own interests.	Enable, protect and expand the revolution. Protect it from external and internal enemies.
	Ruler's personal guard	Protect the executive leadership. (Size matches this mission)	Protect the executive leadership from coups and assassinations. But as flagship units they also can serve as shock troops in military campaigns and execute personal orders of the ruler, especially extrajudicial killings of elites, targeted mass repression, or anti-coup measures.
Expertise (the management of violence)		Specific knowledge based on objective standards of professional competence.	Professional knowledge is not strictly observed.	Professional knowledge is oriented toward social-political values.
	Ruler's personal guard	Rigorous additional training in protective techniques and emergency responses.	Rigorous training in protective techniques and urban warfare, equipped (and paid) better than regular troops. For the regime, (personal) loyalty trumps military competence. Revolutionary units retain their professionalism longer.
Client (Soldier is responsible to whom?)		State (subordinate to civilian authority)	Loyalty varies: It can lie with the nation, an ethnic group, a tribe, the military itself, or the state.	Before revolution: party-movement After: loyalty can shift to the state, the nation, or become confused if the party becomes identified with other entities.
	Ruler's personal guard	Military hierarchy is respected. Units obey orders from their commanders.	In *personalist regime*s: directly commanded by and only loyal to ruler. The head of the unit can be a family member of the ruler. In collegial regimes: such units are underdeveloped and enjoy less autonomy.	In *personalist regime*s: commanded by and only loyal to ruler. In collegial regimes: commanded by the party-movement on behalf of the whole leadership
Corporateness (group consciousness & bureaucratic organization)		Hierarchical, cohesive-organic, collective, subordinate.	Hierarchical, non-cohesive, collective, with shifting subordination	Egalitarian, highly mobile, based on cadres
	Ruler's personal guard	These units are drawn up from several branches of law enforcement, security services and (not always) military. They share resources with other branches and are integrated as a specialized division within the official structure and hierarchy.	These units are established as (de facto) independent organizations, with their own hierarchy, budgets, recruitment programs, armories and barracks. They are much larger than in democracies because they are equipped to protect against coup d'états while the risk of assassination is also higher. Sometimes, there are parallel units tasked with ruler protection, all commanded by the leadership directly and in competition with one another. The more autonomy these units have the more friction there is with regular military structures.
Conscription & recruitment		Restrictive, universal only in war	Restrictive	Universal
	Ruler's personal guard	Rather restrictive: Designated branches of the armed forces and security services recruit from within and from volunteers coming from other branches or law enforcement. Recruitment is procedural. Their command is not appointed by rulers.	Exclusive: Recruits receive additional training (often from foreign instructors) and often share background with ruler (ethnic or place of origin, i.e. 'ethnic stacking') or served directly under the ruler before. Command is personally appointed by the ruler, less so in collegial regimes.	Exclusive: Recruits are highly-trained and must have track record of revolutionary fervor. Sometimes they share background with rulers or served under them before. Leadership is personally appointed by ruler or party-movement leadership.
Ideology & mindset		Conservative	Traditional, materialist, anti-socialist	Revolutionary, dedicated to the party movement.
	Ruler's personal guard	Coservative, patriotic.	Personal loyalty to rulers. Usually bound by patronage and personal ties.	(Extreme) devotion to the cause (i.e. zealots) and to the leadership (in personalist cases: personal loyalty trumps ideology). Can act as a radical faction blocking reforms.

Disposition to intervene		Low	Permanent and continued.	High before and during the revolution, low after the revolution.
	Ruler's personal guard	Low	This varies: under personalist rule, these units have no future in a new political order without the ruler. They intervene in politics, only after rulers are incapacitated or have died, become lame ducks, face ouster by popular revolution, or 'betray' the unit by trying to flee. With established succession rules, such units may become part of the inner circle and become kingmakers (first indirectly later more overtly) until disbanded.
Source: Author's own work, based on: Perlmutter 1977.

Under personalist rule, there is no bright future for these units under a new political order without their patron. In Burkina Faso, after the flight of dictator Blaise Compaoré in 2014, his old Régiment de sécurité présidentielle (RSP) tried to steer and control the transition with Lieutenant Colonel Yacouba Isaac Zida, the deputy RSP commander, briefly assuming the role of acting president after Compaoré's ouster. Later that month, Zida was appointed prime minister in a power-sharing agreement with opposition forces. On 16 September 2015, the RSP staged a coup, taking President Michel Kafando and his government hostage. The army intervened, leading to Kafando's reinstatement on 23 September. The RSP was officially disbanded two days later, a decision that had triggered the coup in the first place.

In (collegial) non-democracies with established succession rules, leadership is usually more restrained and cannot utilize its presidential guard for personal missions. Here, these units can count on a continued role after a leader transfer, but – as shown throughout time – loyalty is not easily passed on to new leaders of the next generation. Hereditary rule in personalist regimes somewhat mitigates this issue as family members are usually in charge of the palace guard and thus often have blood ties to their successor. In general, the trend is that these elite protection units become too autonomous and powerful after the death of their creator and are likely to become bolder over time, changing their position from indirect to direct kingmakers until they are ultimately disbanded. Like with coup traps (Box 5.2), any new palace guard units in the future are likely to repeat the pattern.

There are some notable differences in revolutionary regimes. Here, ideological zeal is an additional factor that keeps these troops more disciplined and professional over time. As shown in the example of the USSR, the NKVD was personalized under Stalin, and its successor was remodeled back into official state structures. So, their constellation, mission and functions can vary and change over time. However, once they succeed in becoming a political actor within the regime (like the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps in Iran), they often take on the role of the reactionary, hardliner faction blocking reform and viciously defending their own interests (Alfoneh 2008; Nader 2015). In any case, more research is needed to explore the additional differences of such units in revolutionary contexts on regime transitions and as a factor in revolutionary legacies.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Presidential Guards and Praetorians, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Alfoneh, A., 2008. The Revolutionary Guards' Role in Iranian Politics. Middle East Quarterly, 15:4.

Cox, D.J., 2001. Close Protection: The Politics of Guarding Russia's Rulers. Bloomsbury Publishing USA.

Goodwin, G., 2014. The Janissaries (Vol. 4). Saqi.

Graber, G.S., 1982. History of the SS. The most terrifying story of the century. McKay.

Haythornthwaite, P., 2012. Napoleon's Guard Infantry. Bloomsbury Publishing.

Hoffmann, P., 1980. Hitler's personal security: protecting the Führer, 1921-1945. Da Capo Press.

Höhne, H., 1979. Der Orden unter dem Totenkopf. Die Geschichte der SS. Bertelsmann

Hunsicker, A., 2007. The Fine Art of Executive Protection: Handbook for the Executive Protection Officer. Universal-Publishers.

Lachouque, H. and Brown, A.S., 2017. The anatomy of glory: Napoleon and his guard. Pen and Sword.

Matthews, A.S., 2023. If You'll Be My Bodyguard: Presidential Guard Units and Leader Capture During Coups d'état. Armed Forces & Society.

Nader, A., 2015. The Revolutionary Guards. US Institute for Peace, Nicolle, D., 1995. The Janissaries. Oxford: Osprey Publishing.

Nordlinger E., 1977. Soldiers in Politics: Military Coups and Governments. Prentice-Hall.

Palmer, J.A., 1953. The origin of the Janissaries. Bulletin of the John Rylands Library, 35:2.

Perlmutter, A., 1969. The praetorian state and the praetorian army: Toward a taxonomy of civil-military relations in developing polities, Comparative Politics, 1:3.

Perlmutter, A., 1977. The Military and Politics in Modern Times: On Professionals, Praetorians, and Revolutionary Soldiers. Yale University Press.

Streltsy, Encyclopædia Britannica, 2011.

Torgler, B. and Frey, B.S., 2013. Politicians: Be killed or survive. Public Choice, 156.

Van den Bosch, J.J.J., 2021. Political Regimes in Central Asia: Tracing Personalist Rule from the Khanates to the Present. In European Handbook of Central Asian Studies: History, Politics, and Societies, Van den Bosch, J., Fauve, F. and De Cordier B., eds., ibidem Verlag.

SEMI-REGIME ACTORS

Mercenaries & Private Military Companies

Commerce has changed the ethics of citizenship and the incentives for national service
– Michael Ignatieff

Private military companies and mercenaries have long been intertwined with the dynamics of modern conflicts, offering a unique blend of military and security services to a diverse array of clients, including governments, multinational corporations, and non-governmental organizations. Their relations to dictatorships remain understudied.

DEFINITION Private military companies (PMCs), also known as private security companies (PSCs) or PMCs, are private entities that provide military and security services to various clients. These services can range from combat operations and security patrols to logistical support and training.

Conversely, mercenaries are usually referred to as individuals who are hired to fight in armed conflicts by parties other than their own government or military. They are motivated primarily by financial gain rather than ideological or nationalistic reasons. Mercenaries have been used since ancient times in various wars and conflicts around the world. In modern times, their use has been regulated by international conventions and treaties, although their use still occurs in various conflicts with highly controversial outcomes.

Alongside mercenaries, there is the concept of 'legionnaires' – foreigners who are neither citizens nor subjects of the state whose military they serve (Grasmeder 2021: 147). Legionnaires can be either volunteers or conscripts. They are typically recruited directly by the state to serve in its military. Mercenaries are individuals who are hired as independent contractors. They operate independently or through private military companies.

While traditional local security firms primarily focus on basic security functions such as building surveillance and access control, PMCs offer a much broader range of services that encompass military methods, leadership training, and specialized equipment. International security firms, often referred to as PMCs, are equipped to handle a wide array of security challenges, ranging from providing armed protection and security consulting to conducting reconnaissance missions and participating in armed combat operations. They typically employ personnel with military backgrounds who possess expertise in various aspects of warfare, including tactics, strategy, and leadership (Adams 1999).

Anna Leander's (2019) argument underscores the critical importance of considering civil-military relations as a regulatory concern within the debate on regulating PMCs. She highlights that the influence of security professionals, whether organized privately in PMCs or enrolled in public armed forces, shapes security concerns and political priorities. She suggests that existing regulations have not adequately addressed the impact of PMCs on shaping politics. She emphasizes that the significance of regulating the role of PMCs in influencing political dynamics has been underestimated. Therefore, she advocates that it is essential to place the issue of regulating 'civil-PMC relations' on the regulatory agenda.

Using the term 'military' to describe these services highlights the qualitative distinction between firms operating in conflict zones within a military context and those primarily engaged in security services in stable environments. This semantic distinction underscores the specialized nature of the services provided by these firms and the unique challenges they present in terms of governance, regulation, and accountability. The trend toward privatizing military functions reflects both a broader enthusiasm for outsourcing state capacities in the industrialized world and specific factors driving the demand for such services. One significant factor is the reluctance of key states to intervene in conflicts that do not directly align with immediate strategic interests or lack domestic support for intervention. Non-state actors such as transnational corporations and humanitarian organizations operating in fragile states are increasingly facing threats from non-state violence. This dynamic compels them to seek security solutions from the commercial sector due to a lack of viable alternatives. The privatization of military functions thus emerges as a response to both the changing nature of conflict and the evolving security needs of various actors operating in complex and often volatile environments.

The expanded definition of PMCs provided here encompasses a wide range of firms operating outside their home states, offering services with the potential for lethal force and influencing military capacities through training and advice. This definition acknowledges the concerns of regulators and humanitarian agencies regarding such activities. It also recognizes the challenge of delineating between offensive and defensive operations, particularly in low-intensity conflicts lacking clear front lines.

SEE ALSO Mercenaries and PMCs are one type of non-state military actor that operate within the complex landscape of modern conflicts. When hired by dictators, they often find themselves pitted against insurgents, rebel regimes or warlords alongside paramilitaries and other (semi-)regime actors. They sometimes play a role in coup-proofing regimes as a backup for or staffing presidential guards, but they can also be sent out for special military assignments not suitable for the regular armed forces.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE PMCs may be employed by governments, multinational corporations, non-governmental organizations (NGOs), or other entities that require specialized military or security expertise, especially if deployed in conflict zones. The diverse roles that PMCs can fulfill highlight their versatility and specialized expertise. Providing security for high-profile individuals or facilities often requires a unique blend of skills, including threat assessment, close protection, and risk mitigation strategies. PMCs with experience in this area can offer tailored solutions to meet the specific security needs of their clients, whether they are corporate executives, government officials, or diplomatic personnel (O'Brien 2000; Singer 2001; Percy 2009). Their ability to gather intelligence, assess terrain, and identify potential threats can provide insights for military operations, security planning, or risk management purposes. Training local forces is an area where PMCs can make a significant impact, particularly in conflict-affected regions where building capable and professional security forces is essential for stability and peacekeeping efforts. Operating in conflict or post-conflict environments, PMCs can provide critical support to stabilize and rebuild communities by offering security solutions, training local personnel, and facilitating humanitarian efforts. Their involvement in such contexts reflects the evolving landscape of security, where non-state actors and asymmetric threats play a significant role.

The presence of PMCs in high-risk environments like oil fields, mining sites, and shipping routes underscores their role in safeguarding critical infrastructure and commercial interests. However, the outsourcing of military functions to private companies raises legitimate ethical and legal concerns. The potential lack of oversight, transparency, and accountability inherent in PMC operations can create opportunities for abuse and misconduct, including human rights violations. Ensuring robust regulatory frameworks, accountability mechanisms, and adherence to international humanitarian law are critical to mitigate these risks and uphold ethical standards in the use of PMCs.

One of the main advantages of hiring mercenaries is their flexibility and readiness to engage in combat. They can be quickly recruited and deployed, and their allegiance is typically to the entity that pays them rather than to any cause. However, their use can also be controversial, as they may lack the discipline and loyalty of regular military forces, and their actions can sometimes lead to human rights abuses or other violations of international law.

ORIGIN The use of mercenaries or hired soldiers is an age-old practice that dates back centuries. Throughout history, rulers and states have employed mercenaries for various reasons, including supplementing their own military forces, accessing specialized skills or expertise, and distancing themselves from the political or moral implications of a conflict. In modern times, the term 'mercenaries' has evolved to encompass a broader range of private military actors, including PMCs and security contractors. These entities offer a wide range of military and security services to clients ranging from governments and multinational corporations to NGOs and political movements. The motivations for hiring mercenaries or private military services in the twenty-first century can vary widely, from addressing security gaps or resource constraints to pursuing strategic objectives with greater flexibility and discretion. However, as with historical practices, the use of mercenaries in contemporary conflicts raises ethical, legal, and political concerns regarding accountability, transparency, and adherence to international humanitarian law.

As economic pressures and shifting political priorities lead major states to reduce their armed forces and scale back foreign military interventions, smaller states, as well as other entities such as corporations or non-state actors, may find the mercenary route increasingly appealing. The emergence of PMCs or international security firms in the 1990s reflected this changing dynamic. PMCs distinguish themselves from ordinary security firms by providing a broader spectrum of services, including combat operations, intelligence gathering, logistical support, and training of security personnel. They often operate in conflict zones, post-conflict environments, or high-risk regions where conventional military forces may be constrained or where additional security measures are required to protect assets, personnel, or infrastructure.

By recognizing and addressing the influence of PMCs on political processes, regulations can better ensure accountability, transparency, and adherence to democratic principles in the conduct of security operations. This perspective broadens the scope of regulatory efforts beyond purely operational aspects to encompass the broader societal and political implications of PMC activities. The assertion that PSCs and other forms of private force provide states with a convenient means to pursue foreign policy goals they might otherwise struggle to achieve holds merit. By outsourcing certain military functions to private entities, states can potentially pursue objectives with less public scrutiny and political risk. However, this approach can also lead to unforeseen consequences when proper policies and oversight mechanisms are lacking. One of the most significant risks associated with the use of private force is its potential to undermine war efforts. Poorly managed or unregulated private security engagements can result in operational inefficiencies, coordination challenges, and even human rights abuses, all of which can weaken the effectiveness of military campaigns.

Reliance on private forces can expose states to scandal and reputational damage, particularly if contractors engage in misconduct or illegal activities. This can erode public trust, damage diplomatic relations, and hinder the state's ability to achieve its foreign policy objectives. Gentil-Fernandes et al. (2024) find that foremost rulers with weak ties to the international community are likely to hire mercenaries. Leaders with high coup risk and low international accountability are especially likely to do so. The use of private forces can complicate rather than simplify the pursuit of policy goals. The involvement of private actors introduces additional layers of complexity to decision-making processes, coordination efforts, and accountability mechanisms. Moreover, private forces may have agendas or incentives that do not align with the state's interests, leading to divergent objectives and potentially counterproductive outcomes.

From the supply side, dictatorships, especially great or regional powers, sometimes set up PMCs (see below), usually for the same purpose as other states use paramilitaries to lower their accountability when outsourcing violence. Paramilitaries are, of course, used domestically, while mercenaries are sent to foreign theaters. These states do not use mercenaries for coup-proofing.

From the demand-state, dictatorships with unreliable armed forces, usually war-torn countries with a history of praetorianism (cf. 'coup traps' – Box 5.2) and with the available funds (i.e. resource curses) can hire mercenaries. E.M.F. Grasmeder (2021: 192) found that "when states find themselves simultaneously threatened externally and constrained domestically, they are likely to enlist legionnaires as a tool to balance between these political and security pressures."

Mehrl and Abel Escribà-Folch (2023) find that personalist regimes, in particular, recruit foreign nationals into their armed forces. By having soldiers who are not connected to domestic social networks, dictators can minimize the likelihood of military conspiracies against them. Foreign recruits are less likely to engage in or support coup attempts due to their dependency on the regime for their livelihood and status. In addition, the presence of foreign recruits in the armed forces can deter mass uprisings by signaling the regime's willingness to use violent repression against protesters. In a global sample from 1946 to 2010, the authors find that higher levels of personalism increase the likelihood of recruiting foreign legionnaires.

Van den Bosch (2021: 108; 250-251) – in a sample of Sub Saharan personalist dictators – noted a difference between tyrants with a civilian background (i) and military strongmen (ii) when it comes to recruitment patterns. The latter (ii) have a military background and use paramilitaries for dealing with rebels, but not for coup-proofing. The former (i) absolutely do not trust the armed forces, often heavily coup-proof them by reducing their abilities to execute a coup and counter threats by creating paramilitaries. Sometimes civilian despots (i) also rely on mercenaries to protect their regime, like François Bozizé in the Central Africa Republic, who staffed his presidential guard with Chadian mercenaries but also convinced South Africa to deploy (about 400) hirelings (in exchange for mining contracts) to secure the capital.

Lastly, it has been argued that private forces, whether they operate as mercenaries, PMCs, or PSCs, possess the inherent ability to influence civil wars and conflict dynamics in which they are involved (as shown in the entry on coups sometimes they are hired to take over a small (island) states, although they are not successful in that regard). Their actions and presence can significantly shape the trajectory and outcomes of conflicts, highlighting the importance of establishing clear policies, regulations, and oversight mechanisms to mitigate risks and ensure responsible conduct (Percy 2009).

LITERATURE The governance of PMCs has not been thoroughly examined in a sustained manner. Much of the existing literature focuses on specific incidents involving PMCs or offers normative arguments based on human rights principles, often lacking a comprehensive understanding of the phenomenon itself. A particular gap exists in differentiating between modern PMCs and traditional mercenaries, which is crucial for understanding their roles and implications in contemporary conflicts.

CLASSIFICATIONS The expansive nature of PMCs renders them a military tool with significant and far-reaching consequences. Operating outside conventional legal frameworks, PMCs have an expanding field of activity that encompasses a wide range of military services. These span a broad spectrum and may include specialized tasks such as strategic planning, intelligence gathering, investigations, reconnaissance (land, sea, or air), flight operations (staffed or unstaffed), satellite surveillance and intelligence, knowledge transfer with military applications, and providing material or technical support to traditional armed forces.

The versatility and expertise offered by PMCs make them attractive partners for governments, international organizations, and other entities seeking military capabilities beyond what traditional armed forces can provide. The examples of South Africa, the US, and Russia illustrate different models of PMCs, each with its distinct characteristics and operational approaches.

The South African model, exemplified by historical company Executive Outcomes (EO), resembles traditional mercenaries. PMCs operating under this model conduct autonomous military campaigns and finance their operations using resources from the countries where they are deployed. For instance, EO's support of the government forces of Sierra Leone in 1996 was partially funded through diamond concessions obtained in the country.

In contrast, the US Blackwater model represents a form of 'military entrepreneurship' that integrates PMCs within and strengthens the traditional armed forces of a powerful state. In response to budget pressures and the need to optimize military capabilities, the US government made significant cuts to the army's budget between 1989 and 1993. As part of this process, the US Department of Defense began subcontracting various tasks, including logistics, to civilian companies like Blackwater. This allowed the military to focus on combat operations while outsourcing non-combat functions to private contractors. This privatization of military functions became a key component of US strategy, particularly in the context of the war against terrorism.

Russia also has its model of proxy-PMCs, like PMC Redut (ЧВК Редут), PMC Patriot (ЧВК Патриот) or the Wagner Group (see 'examples' below). In contrast to the Western model (e.g., the US), Russian PMCs are primarily used as tools of state influence and irregular warfare. Most are proxies for its intelligence services (GRU) and serve to advance Russia's geopolitical interests by providing Moscow with a means to project power, influence foreign governments, and secure economic gains, such as access to natural resources. While PMCs are technically illegal under Russian law, they operate in a legal gray area that provides the Kremlin with plausible deniability. The lack of formal recognition means that these companies do not pay taxes or have official legal standing within Russia. PMCs are appealing to Moscow based on their deniability, the lack of state accountability for their actions perceived expendability in comparison to Russian forces, and lower costs (Katz et al. 2020; Doxsee 2022).

However, it is notable that Russia, like the US, has utilized PMCs as part of its military strategy, particularly in conflicts such as the Syrian civil war and the conflict in Eastern Ukraine. These diverse models of PMCs reflect the varying approaches of states to outsourcing military functions and leveraging private sector expertise in the pursuit of national security objectives. Each model presents unique challenges and implications, highlighting the complexity of the private military industry and the need for careful consideration of its role in contemporary security contexts.

MEASUREMENT & METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES The difficulty in assessing even the total size of the private military services market stems from various factors, including limited access to data and the reluctance of governments to disclose details about their use of such services. Additionally, some PMCs may generate significant income from activities such as resource exploitation in the countries where they operate, further complicating efforts to measure the market size accurately. The statement made by President Putin regarding the finances of the Wagner Group in 2023 represents a notable shift in approach, particularly in the context of Russian involvement with private military actors. Putin's disclosure of substantial financial support provided by the Russian state to Wagner, along with efforts to discredit its chief, Yevgeny Prigozhin, sheds light on the extent of state involvement in financing and supporting private military groups. While specific disclosures like Putin's statement offer glimpses into the financial dynamics of certain PMCs, they may not provide a comprehensive picture of the entire industry. Nonetheless, such revelations underscore the significance of state sponsorship and support in the operations of private military entities.

The estimated value of the global security industry provided by Transparency International Germany in 2016, exceeding two hundred billion dollars, gives a sense of the scale and economic importance of the sector. However, this figure may not fully capture the breadth of activities and revenue streams associated with private military services, given the diverse range of actors and operations within the industry.

There is an urgent need for a realistic regulatory approach to address the challenges posed by unaccountable actors wielding significant force. This approach must balance the interests of both consumers and suppliers within this evolving industry. Achieving this balance is essential for ensuring accountability, transparency, and ethical conduct within the private military sector. Without such regulation, there is a high risk of exploitation, human rights abuses, and unchecked influence in conflict zones and beyond.

EXAMPLES The Wagner Group (ЧВК Вагнер – 'PMC Wagner,' also known colloquially as the 'musicians' or the 'orchestra') represents a unique and highly controversial approach to private military operations, differing significantly from traditional models observed in South Africa, the US, and Russia. The Wagner Group operates with a wide-ranging scope and exhibits a disregard for human rights and international humanitarian law, operating largely with impunity. Unlike other PMCs, the Wagner Group's activities transcend traditional military roles and extend into criminal enterprises, resembling a cross between a special forces team and a mafia-style organized crime network. This multifaceted approach was evident in Ukraine, where the Wagner Group acted as a paramilitary, parastatal criminal group, engaging in combat operations as well as other destabilizing activities.

Prior to its involvement in Ukraine, Wagner was active across the globe, challenging Western interests in regions such as the Central African Republic, Mali, and Syria. Its activities included attempts to undermine EU missions and member states' activities in Africa. Wherever they operated, Wagner forces were accused of committing serious human rights abuses, including torture, rape, and summary executions. Beyond its combat role, the Wagner Group was also involved in information warfare through its close association with the Patriot Media Group for orchestrating a powerful campaign of disinformation to advance its interests and those of the Russian government. This included efforts to influence elections in both the US and Europe using troll farms and propaganda tactics. Despite its significant influence and disruptive activities, the Wagner Group's recent rebellion in Russia led to a crackdown, resulting in the closure of Patriot Media Group. This event highlighted the limits and associated risks of the Wagner Group's approach, serving as a cautionary tale for emerging powers tempted to follow similar paths of private military expansion and exploitation.

The role of the Wagner Group, acting as a private group, in effect replacing the regular Russian army on the battlefield in Ukraine, has been remarkable. In this instance, Wagner's 'client' was the Russian state itself, although the relationship between Wagner's forces and the Russian military establishment has been notably tense. This tension culminated in overt rebellion in June 2023, when Wagner clashed with the Russian armed forces and began advancing toward Moscow after seizing control of Rostov, the headquarters of the Russian Southern military district (a mutiny that did not end well for its founder, the Russian oligarch, Yevgeny Prigozhin, 1961-2023). While the Wagner Group's activities in Ukraine have garnered significant attention, its operations in Africa have received less publicity despite making substantial inroads across the continent. Specifically, the Wagner Group has been involved in countries such as Libya, the Central African Republic, Sudan, and Mali. In these contexts, the Wagner Group's activities extend far beyond the typical scope of a PMC, as its service portfolio in Africa is extensive and encompasses a range of activities beyond conventional military operations. The nature of the Wagner Group's involvement in these countries and the implications of its activities warrant careful analysis and scrutiny. By examining case studies from Africa, it becomes apparent that the Wagner Group's role as a private military actor transcends traditional boundaries and raises significant questions about accountability, legality, and the broader implications for regional stability and security (Marten 2023).

IMPACT ON POLICY The increasing reliance on PMCs by states is part of a broader trend involving the restructuring and adaptation of traditional tools of state sovereignty in response to evolving security challenges. This trend encompasses various aspects such as border and territory control, protection of infrastructure, and addressing hybrid threats and propaganda in the contemporary security landscape.

In Western contexts, this shift toward PMCs is often driven by factors such as budgetary constraints, public pressure to reduce direct state investment in the military (exemplified by Cold War fatigue in the 1990s), and the complexity of out-of-area operations. In other regions, the rise of PMCs can be attributed to the general weakness of state structures, including the military, and the increasing prevalence of conflict zones.

Governments frequently turn to the private sector as a means of optimizing their resources and achieving greater efficiency in security operations. However, despite their utility, PMCs are increasingly viewed as problematic due to concerns regarding legitimacy, accountability, and their potential to undermine state sovereignty.

Accountability issues surrounding PMCs raise questions about their effectiveness and their broader impact on promoting peace and stability. Moreover, there are challenges associated with ensuring the demilitarization of PMCs once their engagement in a conflict or security operation concludes.

Addressing these issues requires comprehensive regulatory frameworks that hold PMCs accountable for their actions, ensure transparency in their operations, and establish mechanisms for demilitarization and post-conflict transition.

NEW FRONTIERS The utilization of PMCs as a means to bolster national security and stability can paradoxically lead to the erosion of state institutions, both in democratic and autocratic contexts. In states where institutions like the police, judiciary, and military are fragile or where the rule of law is vulnerable to challenge, turning to private armies might seem like a pragmatic choice. However, this reliance on PMCs carries significant risks. One concerning aspect is the potential for private entities to encroach upon areas traditionally reserved for state authority. PMCs may expand their influence into domains historically governed by state institutions, undermining the state's monopoly on violence and weakening its overall control. Moreover, PMCs often recruit actively in contexts where state institutions are weak, such as during periods of significant demobilization from armed forces or in environments with lax control over access to military equipment. This recruitment can exacerbate existing security challenges and contribute to the proliferation of armed groups outside state control. Countries emerging from conflict face particular challenges in this regard. The presence of PMCs in post-conflict environments can complicate efforts to establish effective governance structures, foster reconciliation, and rebuild trust in state institutions. Addressing these challenges requires concerted efforts to strengthen state institutions, enhance oversight and regulation of PMCs, and promote accountability for their actions.

The challenges of post-conflict reintegration and disarmament of PMC fighters are significant, particularly in contexts where state institutions are fragile. Reintegrating former PMC fighters into civil society and gaining control over their weapons can be complex and may require coordinated efforts involving various stakeholders, including governments, international organizations, and civil society groups. Without effective reintegration and disarmament measures, there is a risk of continued violence and instability even after the formal cessation of conflict.

Moreover, the business model of PMCs is inherently tied to the existence of conflict or the threat of conflict. This reliance on conflict for profitability can incentivize PMCs to perpetuate or exacerbate instability rather than work toward peace and stability. PMCs, especially those closer to the mercenary model, may have little interest in achieving peace as it could undermine their financial interests.

There is also a risk that PMCs, particularly those operating in areas with weak governance structures, could establish control over regions and assert legitimacy. This can further complicate efforts to establish effective governance and the rule of law, potentially leading to the creation of parallel power structures that undermine state authority. Addressing these challenges requires comprehensive strategies that prioritize 'disarmament, demobilization, and reintegration' (DDR) programs for former PMC fighters. Additionally, efforts to strengthen state institutions, enhance governance, and promote accountability are essential for mitigating the risks posed by PMCs to peace and stability in conflict-affected regions.

How to cite:

Irrera, Daniela, 2025. Mercenaries and Private Military Companies, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adams, T.K., 1999. The new mercenaries and the privatization of conflict. The US Army War College Quarterly: Parameters, 29:2.

Avant, D., 2004. Mercenaries. Foreign Policy, 143.

Chesterman, S. and Lehnardt, C., eds., 2007. From mercenaries to market: The rise and regulation of private military companies. Oxford University Press.

Doxsee, C., 2022. Putin's Proxies: Examining Russia's Use of Private Military Companies. Center for Strategic International Studies (CSIS).

Gentil-Fernandes, L., Morrison, K. and Otto, J., 2024. Buying Survival: Why Do Leaders Hire Mercenaries? Security Studies, 33:2.

Grasmeder, E.M., 2021. Leaning on legionnaires: Why modern states recruit foreign soldiers. International Security, 46:1.

Jäger, T. and Kümmel, G., eds., 2009. Private military and security companies: Chances, problems, pitfalls and prospects. Springer Science & Business Media.

Katz, B., Jones, S.G., Doxsee, C. and Harrington, N., 2020. The Expansion of Russian Private Military Companies. Center for Strategic International Studies (CSIS).

Kinsey, C., 2006. Corporate soldiers and international security: The rise of private military companies. Routledge.

Leander, A., 2019. Making markets responsible: Revisiting the state monopoly on the legitimate use of force. In The Sociology of Privatized Security, Swed, O. and Crosbie, T., eds., Springer.

Marten, K., 2019. Russia's use of semi-state security forces: the case of the Wagner Group. Post-Soviet Affairs, 35:3.

Mehrl, M. and Escribà-Folch, A., 2024. The dictator's legionnaires: foreign recruitment, coups, and uprisings. Democratization, 31:4.

O'Brien, K.A., 2000. PMCs, myths and mercenaries: The debate on private military companies. The RUSI Journal, 145:1.

Percy, S., 2009. Private security companies and civil wars. Civil Wars, 11:1.

Pokalova, E., 2023. The Wagner group in Africa: Russia's quasi-state agent of influence. Studies in Conflict & Terrorism.

Singer, P.W., 2001. Corporate warriors: The rise of the privatized military industry and its ramifications for international security. International security, 26:3.

Van den Bosch, J.J.J., 2021. Personalist Rule in Africa and Other World Regions, Routledge.

Paramilitaries & Death Squads

Be wary of paramilitaries. When the men with guns who have always claimed to be against the system start wearing uniforms and marching with torches and pictures of a leader, the end is nigh. When the pro-leader paramilitary and the official police and military intermingle, the end has come.
– Timothy Snyder, On Tyranny: Twenty Lessons from the Twentieth Century (2017)

Paramilitaries and death squads are armed non-state actors that engage in acts of violence against the population at the behest of a regime. Though not officially part of the state, the violence caused by paramilitaries and death squads is sanctioned by the regime either explicitly or implicitly through the regime's lack of activity. They are almost always used by non-democratic regimes to induce compliance through fear and to deter the public from supporting the opposition (Rummel 1994). They are also often used in the context of an ongoing conflict.

SEE ALSO Death Squads and paramilitaries can be referred to as state-sponsored militias, especially if they are former warlords that are co-opted into the regime (Ahram 2011). At times, mercenaries fulfill the same functions (e.g., regime protection, coup-proofing, executing repression), but a clear distinction should be made between militias and paramilitaries that oppose the regime and/or try to take over power, cf. rebel regimes. Death squads and paramilitaries fulfill overlapping tasks within the larger spectrum of coercive regime repression, with the former more often involved in more 'covert' and 'targeted' activities (opposition assassination, sabotage, terror attacks (Box 3.13), disappearances, etc.) and the latter also in 'overt' forms, like voter intimidation and strike breaking and sometimes act as presidential guards (or their equivalent). Their indirect link with the state reduces their accountability and boosts the deniability of rulers.

DEFINITION Death squads and paramilitaries are violent non-state actors (or irregular organizations) that operate outside the formal security sector and central government command but usually receive support from factions of the state (Grajales 2011). Though they remain outside the law, they often enjoy some of the resources, access and status that is exclusive to the state/regime or foreign government. The state may never officially acknowledge the links with paramilitary organizations and death squads, yet they do little to eliminate them. It is elements within the state itself that play a role in their creation and direction, though the state usually refuses to recognize any links to the group. They also may make alliances with multiple powerholders in the system, such as the economic elite. Brenda Breuil and Ralph Rozema claim that death squads and paramilitaries operate somewhere in between the state security apparatus and the criminal underworld of killers and torturers (Breuil & Rozema 2009). Paramilitaries and death squads are mostly offensive tools of authoritarian regimes to target groups that aim to change the status quo, challenge the state's or regime's legitimacy, or are otherwise considered problematic for the state and the economic and political elites.

Paramilitary-style forces are more commonly found in dictatorships because the latter often create these types of units to offset the power of the regular military (cf. coup-proofing). Dictatorships that use paramilitary organizations for this purpose will often build these units to be close in size or even more powerful than the regular army so that they can serve as an effective counterweight (Sudduth 2017). In Syria, under Bashar al-Assad, the paramilitary forces consisted of over 100,000 men (Makara 2013), while in Saddam Hussein's Iraq, just one paramilitary group – the Fedayeen Saddam (Fidā'iyyī Saddām – 'Saddam's Men of Sacrifice') – had about 40,000 members (Otterman 2005).

In addition to the size of paramilitary organizations, the dictator may reassign the more capable soldiers to this outside unit, as Hussein did by moving more skilled troops to the Republican Guard, from the Iraqi army (Powell 2019). In Yemen, under Ali Abdullah Saleh,, paramilitary units were given priority over the regular military and were considered the foundation of the regime's security (Makara 2013). The paramilitary may also be the recipient of more funding and better weapons, as was the case in Sierra Leone when Siaka Stevens built up paramilitaries at the expense of the country's army (Berg 2020). Because paramilitary organizations are usually the recipients of better funding and training, they are often better at fighting than the regular army – though in autocracies, that is often not their main purpose (Powell 2019).

Paramilitary units that lie outside the law and assist the regime in denying responsibility often have a reputation for brutality (Seigel 2018). They enable the state to perpetuate violence against state enemies while still maintaining a clean international appearance. Paramilitaries do not depend on being considered legitimate domestically or to the international community. Paramilitary groups are used on behalf of the political establishment to handle the dirty business of targeted kidnappings and killings, massacres, ethnic cleansing and forcible resettlements. In Colombia, the AUC (Autodefensas Unidas de Colombia – United Self-Defense Forces) was especially brutal and was involved in many atrocities, such as kidnappings (Raphael 2009). The biggest victims of the AUC were ordinary Colombians, and many Indigenous communities were displaced (Grajales 2017).

In addition to coup-proofing, paramilitary organizations are often used to counter efforts for reform and support the incumbent regime in defending the political and economic status quo. (By definition, paramilitaries are never attempting to overthrow the established order.) This is another reason why democracies are less likely to have paramilitary organizations: meaningful elections can be held to resolve these sorts of disputes. In contrast, in hybrid regimes and autocracies, violence is used to protect the established order. In Nicaragua, the US-backed 'Contras' (derived from la contrarrevolución) were one of the most notable right-wing paramilitary groups, comprising recruits from the former National Guard of the Somoza dictatorship, ousted in 1979 (Miranda & Ratliff 1992). Their official role was to undermine the military support structure of the new Nicaraguan Marxist Sandinista government (allied with Cuba), but they were noted for terrorizing Nicaraguan villages and bombing health clinics, schools, irrigation projects, power plants, oil pipelines, ports and bridges (Roberts 1990). For a while, RENAMO (Resistência Nacional Moçambicana – 'Mozambican National Resistance Movement') played a similar role in southern Africa on behalf of South Rhodesia and the Apartheid regime (cf. Box 4.7).

Autocracies are often successful at using paramilitaries in counterinsurgency. Russia has been able to successfully suppress the vast majority of the insurgencies that it has faced in the last century this way (Byman 2016). Paramilitary organizations tend to have the same political views as military hardliners and can be used effectively by the regime to uphold the status quo (Mazzei 2009).

Though paramilitaries often receive some sort of funding from the state, they are also largely self-funded, usually by being involved in black market activity, illegally selling weapons, drugs or other valuable commodities such as oil and diamonds (Naylor 2017) – cf. resource curse. They may also develop a system of taxation or side payments in exchange for protection (Saab & Taylor 2009). This is particularly the case in scenarios where they control large rural areas (Grajales 2017).

There is no consensus over whether or not a 'death squad' is a type of paramilitary group or vice versa. We see these two groups as very similar but with slight differences. A paramilitary group consists of armed men that are organized on a military model and are dependent on the existing armed forces, while also autonomous in terms of their tactics. A death squad has more structural, tactical and strategic autonomy from the regular army and police than a paramilitary organization. The death squad may be considered to be a comparatively smaller and more clandestine and shadowy organization that preys on regime opponents. Paramilitaries (like militias) can incorporate youth movements and actively recruit children (cf. Box 8.5). Death squads are not known for this.

A death squad differs from paramilitaries because its primary activities involve carrying out extrajudicial killings, massacres, and/or enforced disappearances. However, like paramilitaries, death squads enable the state to have plausible deniability (Sluka 2000). The state never takes responsibility for the atrocities committed. Some of these atrocities are quite significant. The Contras were responsible for killing as many as 8,000 civilians and assassinating as many as 910 state officials (Brody 1985). As mentioned, the usage of both paramilitaries and death squads causes violence levels to escalate in conflict settings.

Paramilitary forces sometimes identify themselves as self-defense units, but they are largely aggressive and are more likely to commit human rights abuses compared to insurgencies that they target. Paramilitaries might also be involved in controlling territory and municipalities, while death squads are usually only involved in extrajudicial killings, kidnappings and other violent acts (Sanford 2003). A paramilitary organization is also more likely to receive funding and training from state authorities than a death squad, and it may be harder for the state to distance itself.

Death squads are distinct enough from the state. Nevertheless, because many of the members come from the armed forces, death squads are usually linked to the state's security apparatus or possibly some rogue element of it, though technically, they are autonomous from the state. They are also not a lone actor, and have many members involved that may be divided into small cells. There is also a tiered system with a leader at the top, along with other positions such as hitmen, drivers and look-outs. The head may have more direct links with other security forces and may be responsible for recruiting and paying off the foot soldiers. In other cases, the foot soldiers may not know who the leader of the organization is. Death squads can also be distinguished from vigilantism (cf. Box 1.6), as they are not spontaneous organizations and are much better planned, financed and executed.

Death squads are well equipped with weapons, often because members were already in possession of them. To avoid being noticed, death squad members usually do not wear uniforms, though sometimes they may wear masks. In the case of the DDS (Davao Death Squad) in the Philippines, the death squad members did not wear uniforms, only baseball caps, and jackets and buttoned shirts to hide firearms and knives, but no masks. They rode around on motorcycles with no license plates.

Paramilitary units are usually recruited from elite, well-trained portions of a country's military and police force from members or units that have been made redundant or other breakaway units. Active-duty military officers were recruited to join paramilitaries in Colombia, with the AUC having a huge membership of 80,000 at its height. The recruitment of death squad members also usually comes from the secret police forces, special counterinsurgency units (cf. intelligence services), government soldiers, regular police members, mercenaries and expelled police officers. Death squads may also recruit members of the military or police who are in need of more income. In the case of Brazil, a police officer could be working at a desk by day and working covertly for a death squad by night (Scheper-Hughes 2006).

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Death squads and paramilitaries are prevalent around the world and have usually been used by non-democratic regimes as a tool of repression that blurs private and public interests. The privatization of state violence most negatively impacts civilians. Instead of security forces being used to defend a nation's borders, armed men are used to suppress internal 'threats' from civilians directly. Paramilitary organizations and death squads have been responsible for millions of deaths and hundreds of thousands of disappearances. Case in point, from the period 1980 to 2000, over 300,000 people have 'disappeared' (Sluka 2000). In spite of this, their establishment is encouraged, or at least tolerated by the state, risking the state's monopoly over the use of force. They illustrate the deterioration of the rule of law in non-democratic regimes and the militarization of both state and society.

Death squads, in particular, are also significant because they are the embodiment of state terror (Box 3.13). Death squads are how authoritarian regimes deal with political opponents and members of different ethnic and religious groups that supposedly pose a threat to the regime's rule. Death squads gun down members of the opposition and engage in different acts of torture (Box 7.6). Yury Zhukov (2007) argues that regime type affects freedom of action of death squads and paramilitary groups. Authoritarian regimes face few constraints when combating revolts and face little pressure to minimize the use of force.

Paramilitaries and death squads enable the state to have plausible deniability (Sluka 2000: 227). The state never takes responsibility for the atrocities committed. From 1947-1949, the Soviet Union engaged in a brutal enemy-centric counterinsurgency campaign in western and southwestern Ukraine against the Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA), a secessionist movement. The Kremlin used Ukrainian non-state actors to conduct violence on the USSR's behalf. The usage of both paramilitaries and death squads causes violence levels to escalate (Zhukov 2007).

Death squads also affect the legitimacy of the state and encourage a culture of impunity, though they sometimes operate with the public's consent, as has been the case with the upper and middle classes in Brazil. They operate with immunity from any sort of prosecution and can threaten witnesses and intimidate judges. They are also not brought to trial due to inefficiencies in the judiciary. For other countries, such as in Central America, the death squads' pursuit of impoverished citizens has deeply affected the public's trust in the state.

Once death squads and paramilitary organizations are created, they are often difficult to control and may be able to evade the government and develop their own agenda (Dasgupta 2009). In Central America, the paramilitaries were more violent than the insurgencies that were assigned to fight, and both the paramilitaries and the death squads paid no attention to the notion of human rights.

ORIGIN It is disputable when the term death squad was first used. One of the earliest versions of a death squad may have been in Argentina in the 1840s or early 1850s. Dictator General Juan Manuel de Rosas created a death squad group called the Mazorcas to carry out extrajudicial killings of his opponents. The group comprised members of the police but Rosas kept an official distance from them. More death squads served at the behest of authoritarian regimes all over Latin America, including Brazil, Chile, Colombia, and Peru, during the Cold War (Campbell & Brenner 2002). In the Latin American context, death squads engaged in non-institutionalized forms of violence to preserve the economic and political status quo (Peralta & Beverly 1980). Due to an endless supply of US military funding, this helped reinforce the belief that the military had a right to use violent repression against the opposition (Malloy & Seligson 1987).

Though death squads have been prevalent in Latin America, they are not unique to the region or the Cold War period. Death squads also appeared in Germany, Romania, and Africa; South African death squads operating with the support of the Apartheid regime (Box 4.7) formed in the 1960s. South African death squads also operated in Namibia in the 1970s and 1980s to fight against Black African political parties.

LITERATURE Much has been written about where death squads and paramilitaries emerge, usually in conflict and violence literature. One of the themes in the literature is what explains the emergence of these types of groups. Death squads often emerge in settings where there is an oligarchy, which has a monopoly over the country's resources and wealth. They also emerge in states where there may be a significant degree of wealth for parts of the population. In contrast to warlords, death squads and paramilitaries do not just emerge in failed states (cf. state fragility & failure); they emerge with the complicity of the state (Mazzei 2009). In contrast to organized crime, the act of violence is not utilized to financially benefit members of these groups directly. As stated previously, they also tend to emerge in non-democratic regimes, particularly during a conflict.

Death squads have often been formed to defend the interests of the wealthy or other elite groups, while paramilitaries tend to have the same political views as military hardliners (Mazzei 2009: 30). Paramilitary organizations and death squads are often set up to protect property rights against landless peasants and to prevent any sort of agrarian counter-reform (Grajales 2011). Both groups use violence to protect the established order and are never attempting to overthrow it. They enable the state to perpetuate violence against state enemies while still maintaining a clean international appearance and plausible deniability (Grajales 2011). Death squads are also usually right-wing and counter-revolutionary in that they oppose any group that aims to challenge the status quo (Sluka 2000). They are more likely to emerge in societies where there is an alliance between the military and the economic elite. The ideological orientation of paramilitary organizations has been mostly right-wing, but there have been left-wing paramilitaries as well.

Scholars have also investigated why individuals join these violent groups. Though recruits join out of some grassroots activism and not just for a salary, financial gain is a big motivation for many death squad members. In the case of the DDS, which targets criminals in the Philippines, members are paid much more than they would normally, earning as much as $2,000 per operation (Ezrow 2017). While some DDS members were recruited from the security apparatus, many recruits were either unemployed or petty criminals. Due to this financial incentive, the DDS was able to grow from only ten members to 500 by 2009 (Breuil & Rozema 2009).

As mentioned, scholars have noted that paramilitaries and death squads are both tools of repressive regimes to deal with the opposition and maintain order, especially in cases where the traditional military is hesitant to fire on their people (Rummel 1994; Sluka 2000). Both groups' success is not dependent on being considered legitimate domestically or by the international community. Paramilitaries sometimes emerge in states that are unable or unwilling to maintain a monopoly over the legitimate use of force. Paramilitaries might be used to fight against an insurgency or some other organized (or semi-organized) violent non-state group.

As for death squads, they are often sub-contracted by the state to avoid being associated with the atrocities committed. In other words, the state allows and/or tacitly supports death squads to do the dirty work that it does not want to be legally liable for. They are used on behalf of the political establishment to handle targeted kidnappings and killings, massacres, ethnic cleansing and forcible resettlements that the state does not want to be associated with. For example, in Argentina, during military rule (1976-1983), death squads were used by the regime to kidnap the children of 'subversives' and torture them in front of their parents and vice versa. Death squads aim to eliminate the leaders of these 'subversive' movements and terrorize or kill their sympathizers; in contrast to paramilitary organizations, death squads mostly target civilians (Gurr 1988). States may also subcontract work with paramilitary units when facing international constraints. For example, Serbs mobilized paramilitary units during the Bosnian conflict in order to avoid international condemnation.

In addition to operating in areas and in ways that the government wants to avoid directly being involved in, paramilitaries are set up by authoritarian regimes to offset the power of the regular military. This is in line with coup-proofing the regime to prevent the military from attaining too much power and posing a direct challenge to the dictator. These paramilitaries are also staffed by loyalists and are tasked with monitoring the activities of the military and other elites (Kendall-Taylor & Frantz 2017). Paramilitaries are the first group that a dictator may turn to deal with domestic unrest (protests & uprisings). For example, in Libya, Muammar al-Qaddafi's first line of defense was his paramilitaries, not the regular army.

CLASSIFICATIONS There is considerable overlap and ambiguity among the existing terms, as the scholarship has not yet reached a consensus on these concepts. In some cases, a paramilitary organization is also a death squad because the organization is large and set up to offset the regular forces, but it mainly engages in torture and killings of innocent civilians (see the example of the Tonton Macoutes). As for paramilitary organizations, there is some distinction between left and right-wing paramilitary groups. There may also be a difference between groups that have more autonomy from the state and those that have less autonomy. The death squads in El Salvador during its civil war in the 1970s and 1980s were closely associated with the right-wing ARENA party, while it has been harder to trace the death squads from Brazil in the 1990s.

EXAMPLES There are numerous examples of paramilitaries and death squads that have been established to terrorize the population. The Tonton Macoutes was a paramilitary death squad in Haiti set up by personalist dictator François Duvalier in 1959. The Haitians nicknamed this warlord-led goon squad the 'Tonton Macoutes,' after the Creole translation for a mythological bogeyman, about an 'uncle' (tonton) who kidnaps and punishes obstreperous children by snaring them in a gunnysack (macoute) and carrying them off to be consumed at breakfast. Their official name was the Volunteers for National Security (Volontaires de la Sécurité Nationale – VSN). Unlike most death squads, the group was officially part of the Duvalier regime, though it was never part of the regular armed forces. At its height, the group had more than 10,000 members, who wore a uniform of straw hats, denim shirts and sunglasses. This casual look contrasted with the machetes they carried, which they used indiscriminately to instill terror.

The group was set up to provide information for the Duvalier regime and detect any subversion. Like other death squads, they were used to strike terror into anyone who opposed Duvalier. Their methods were particularly violent. Showing no mercy toward civilians, they would often stone people and light them on fire, and people would often disappear at night. Dead bodies were showcased in order to intimidate the public. Even the smallest infraction could lead to a violent reprisal by the group. Because they were poorly paid, they often resorted to stealing and exacting private contributions by force (Ferguson 1988). In total, the group slaughtered more than 600,000 Haitians (Fuller & Wilentz 1991).

In Guatemala, the Fuerzas Armadas Rebeldes was founded by disgruntled Guatemalan army officers in 1963. They practiced a scorched earth campaign, razing 626 Mayan villages. Mano Blanco was another death squad that was involved in the kidnapping of Archbishop Mario Casariego in 1968 in order to provoke a coup. Though most of the violence took place between 1980 and 1982, selective assassinations continued up into the 1990s (Sanford 2003). The Guatemalan paramilitaries kidnapped, tortured to death and buried peasants in hidden graves.

In the Colombian conflict, paramilitaries have been commonplace. One of the most notable paramilitary organizations was the United Self-Defence Forces (AUC), which fought against leftist guerrillas such as the FARC. The paramilitary organizations were particularly violent and were responsible for 80% of the killings (Sanford 2003: 76). Most of the victims were unarmed civilians, often people who worked for NGOs, churches, unions and community activists. Even as late as 2002, paramilitaries killed far more civilians than guerrilla combatants but were barely a target of the government (Grajales 2017).

In El Salvador, death squads were organized by the armed forces to destroy entire villages, including women and children, with a total disregard for human decency or the rule of law. The ARENA party directed all activity in association with the security force members. ARENA party leader Roberto D'Aubuisson sometimes gave directives directly, while at other times, underlings of the party took their own initiative. ARENA was essentially an umbrella organization for a diverse group of death squads, all controlled by the same paymaster. The prevalence of so many death squads gave the appearance of mass participation and multiple sources of responsibility (Arnson et al. 2000). In the dirty war in El Salvador, a UN report found that 10% of the deaths were due to right-wing death squads.

In Nicaragua, the 'Contras' (Frente Democratico Nacional – 1981-1988) were one of the most ruthless right-wing paramilitary groups. They comprised recruits from the former National Guard of the Somoza dictatorship. Various factions from the Somoza regime started a series of rebellions to overthrow the Sandinista government, cooperating only very loosely (Miranda & Ratliff 1992). Their official role was to undermine the military support structure in Nicaragua from the Cuban government (Roberts 1990: 78). In Nicaragua, the Contras terrorized Nicaraguan villages, bombed health clinics, schools, irrigation projects, power plants, oil pipelines, ports and bridges.

This usage of irregular violent groups continued with the second regime of Daniel Ortega. In 2018, in Nicaragua, after students protested against the government's bungled response to wildfires that ravaged the coast, paramilitaries were used to attack and scatter the students. Paramilitaries were used again two weeks later to go after pensioners protesting against cuts to public pensions. Paramilitaries have become more formalized, becoming Ortega's own forces that he uses to attack, harass and imprison opposition members (Thaler & Mosinger 2022).

Under the rapidly autocratizing rule of Rodrigo Duterte, death squads emerged again in the Philippines, ostensibly to target drug dealers and drug users, with little attention to the rule of law. In Duterte's 'war on drugs,' there were a staggering number of unlawful killings that took place. The new strategy of extrajudicial killings leaves no day in court for the victims. This is not the first time that Filipinos have faced the terrors of violent non-state groups that the state has supported. Under dictator Ferdinand Marcos, from the 1960s to the 1980s, paramilitary forces were used to target various rebel groups and other innocent civilians. One of the most notable atrocities was when 20 protesters were killed by paramilitary forces in Escalante, Philippines, in September of 1985 (Youngblood 1986).

MEASUREMENT ISSUES There is no clear definition of what constitutes a death squad or a paramilitary organization. Unlike terrorist groups, there are few databases listing paramilitary and death squads, though many scholars have put together an appendix of different groups from a regional perspective. It is also difficult to prove the government's role in supporting or dictating the activities of death squads. Providing proof usually comes at a great cost to local human rights organizations and monitors, who are themselves often among the prime targets of the death squads.

The Pro-Government Militias Database (PGMD) by Sabine C. Carey, Neil J. Mitchell and Will Lowe (Carey et al. 2013) is updated with the involvement of colleagues (Carey et al. 2022) and is a significant resource for studying pro-government militias (PGMs), which include groups often associated with paramilitary activities and sometimes death squads. The PGMD provides extensive data on the characteristics, behavior, life cycle, and organization of over 500 PGMs across the globe from 1981 to 2014. It includes information on how these groups are linked to governments, their recruitment methods, and the types of violence in which they engage. Its definition of 'pro-government militia' incorporates mercenaries & private military companies.

IMPACT ON POLICY Because death squads and paramilitary organizations have been responsible for gross human rights abuses, there has been renewed attention paid to these types of violent groups by human rights organizations, international organizations and some democratic states. Overall, while international law imposes certain obligations on paramilitary groups, enforcement is challenging due to their often-clandestine nature and the political complexities involved in holding states accountable for creating and protecting such entities.

NEW FRONTIERS In spite of all of the research done on terrorism – or violence by a non-state actor against the state and its citizens, very little research has been done on state terror or the use of terror (Box 3.13) by the state against its citizens. This is in spite of the fact that there are more examples of state terror than of terrorism (Sluka 2000). Others concur that most of the terror since WWII has been carried out by states, most of which have been authoritarian regimes. In the 2022 war in Ukraine, Vladimir Putin mobilized Chechen Kadyrovcy paramilitaries, private military companies and death squads. The 2022 slaughter of civilians in Bucha may have involved not just the Russian military but death squad violence. The 2022 Russian invasion of Ukraine will, unfortunately, provide new evidence of death squads and paramilitaries as Russia engages in more dirty tactics and escalates attacks on civilians. More work needs to be done to understand the impact of death squads and paramilitary organizations, what their relationship is to the state, and in what ways they serve dictatorships beyond coup-proofing and repression.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Paramilitaries and Death Squads, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ahram, A.I., 2011. Proxy warriors: the rise and fall of state-sponsored militias. Stanford University Press.

Arnson, C.J., Chicola, P., Delahunt, W.D., Egeland, J., Gilman, B.A., Hollis, C.C., Moreno, L.A., Ramírez-Ocampo, A. and Suárez, A.R., 2000. The Peace Process in Colombia and US Policy, 246. Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars.

Aspinwall, N., 2019. Duterte Turns Death Squads on Political Activists. Foreign Policy.

Berg, L.A., 2020. Elite bargains and external influence: security assistance and civil-military relations in post-war Liberia and Sierra Leone. Civil Wars, 22:2-3.

Booth, J.A., 1980. A Guatemalan nightmare: levels of political violence, 1966-1972. Journal of Interamerican Studies and World Affairs, 22:2.

Breuil, B.C. and Rozema, R., 2009. Fatal imaginations: death squads in Davao City and Medellín compared. Crime, law and social change, 52.

Brody, R., 1985. Contra terror in Nicaragua: Report of a fact-finding mission, September 1984-January 1985. South End Press.

Byman, D., 2016. 'Death Solves All Problems:' The Authoritarian Model of Counterinsurgency. Journal of Strategic Studies, 39:1.

Campbell, B. and Brenner, A. eds., 2002. Death squads in global perspective: Murder with deniability. Springer.

Carey, S.C., Neil, J.M. and Katrin, P. 2022. The Life, Death and Diversity of Pro-Government Militias: The Fully Revised Pro-Government Militias Database Version 2.0. Research & Politics, 9:1.

Carey, S.C., Neil, J.M. and Lowe, W., 2013. States, the Security Sector and the Monopoly of Violence: A New Database on Pro-Government Militias. Journal of Peace Research, 50:2.

Ezrow, N. 2017. Violent Non-State Actors in Global Politics.

Ferguson, J., 1988. Haiti: from dictatorship to dictatorship. Race & Class, 30:2.

Frantz, E. and Kendall-Taylor, A., 2014. A dictator's toolkit: Understanding how co-optation affects repression in autocracies. Journal of Peace Research, 51:3.

Fuller, A. and Wilentz, A., 1991. Return to the darkest days: Human rights in Haiti since the coup (Vol. 2259). Human Rights Watch.

Grajales, J., 2011. The Demobilization Process of Paramilitaries in Colombia: Between Politics and Justice. Desafios, 23:2.

Grajales, J., 2017. Private security and paramilitarism in Colombia: governing in the midst of violence. Journal of Politics in Latin America, 9:3.

Gurr, T.R., 1988. War, revolution, and the growth of the coercive state. Comparative political studies, 21:1.

Lopez-Reyes, R., 1997. El Salvador: In search of a non-violent peace. Peace Research, 29:4.

Makara, M., 2013. Coup-proofing, military defection, and the Arab Spring. Democracy and Security, 9:4.

Malloy, J.M. and Seligson, M.A. eds., 1987. Authoritarians and democrats: regime transition in Latin America (Vol. 238). The University of Pittsburgh Press.

Mason, T.D. and Krane, D.A., 1989. The political economy of death squads: Toward a theory of the impact of state-sanctioned terror. International Studies Quarterly, 33:2.

Mazzei, J., 2009. Death squads or self-defense forces?: how paramilitary groups emerge and challenge democracy in Latin America. University of North Carolina Press.

Miranda, R. and Ratliff, W.E., 1992. The civil war in Nicaragua: inside the Sandinistas. Transaction Publishers.

Naylor, R.T., 2017. The insurgent economy: Black market operations of guerrilla organizations. In Transnational Financial Crime. Routledge.

Otterman, S., 2005. Iraq: What is the Fedayeen Saddam? Council on Foreign Relations.

Peralta, G.A. and Beverly, J., 1980. Terror and violence as weapons of counterinsurgency in Guatemala. Latin American Perspectives, 7:2-3.

Powell, J., 2019. Leader survival strategies and the onset of civil conflict: A coup-proofing paradox. Armed Forces & Society, 45:1.

Raphael, S., 2009. Paramilitarism and state terror in Colombia. In Contemporary state terrorism. Routledge.
Reding, A., 1996. Exorcising Haiti's ghosts. World Policy Journal, 13:1.
Roberts, K., 1990. Bullying and Bargaining: The United States, Nicaragua, and Conflict Resolution in Central America. International Security, 15:2.
Rummel, R.J., 1994. Power, genocide and mass murder. Journal of Peace Research, 31:1.
Saab, B.Y. and Taylor, A.W., 2009. Criminality and armed groups: A comparative study of FARC and paramilitary groups in Colombia. Studies in Conflict & Terrorism, 32:6.
Sanford, V., 2003. Learning to kill by proxy: Colombian paramilitaries and the legacy of Central American death squads, contras, and civil patrols. Social Justice, 30.
Scheper-Hughes, N., 2006. Death squads and democracy in Northeast Brazil. Law and Disorder in the Postcolony.
Seigel, M., 2018. On the critique of paramilitarism. The Global South, 12:2.
Sluka, J.A., ed., 2000. Death squad: The anthropology of state terror. University of Pennsylvania Press.
Sudduth, J.K., 2017. Coup risk, coup-proofing and leader survival. Journal of Peace Research, 54:1.
Susanne, J. and Rivas, E.T., 2018. The battle for Guatemala: Rebels, death squads, and US power. Routledge.
Thaler, K.M. and Mosinger, E., 2022. Nicaragua: Doubling Down on Dictatorship. Journal of Democracy, 33:2.
Whitney, K.M., 1996. SIN, FRAPH, and the CIA: US covert action in Haiti. Southwestern Journal of Law and Trade in the Americas, 3.
Youngblood, R.L., 1986. The Philippines in 1985: A continuing crisis of confidence. Southeast Asian Affairs.
Zhukov, Y., 2007. Examining the authoritarian model of counter-insurgency: The Soviet campaign against the Ukrainian insurgent army. Small Wars & Insurgencies, 18:3.

Youth Movements as Paramilitary Organizations

Trau keinem Fuchs auf grüner Heid und keinem Jud auf seinem Eid! Ein Bilderbuch für Gross und Klein
(Don't Trust A Fox On His Green Heath, Nor The Jew On His Oath! A picture book for grown-ups and little ones)
Illustrated by Elvira Bauer, published by Der Stürmer, 1936
(Nazi propaganda for young children)

Militarized youth movements, such as the Komsomol (Коммунистический союз молодёжи – 'Комсомол') and its entry-level 'Little Octobrists' (7–9 years) and 'Young Pioneers' (8–15 years) in the Soviet Union or the Hitlerjugend (Hitler Youth) in Nazi Germany, serve as archetypes of paramilitary youth organizations. Less known is the Opera Nazionale Balilla in Fascist Italy. Established in 1926, this organization aimed to promote loyalty to the state and instill fascist ideology among Italian youth. It also included various age-specific groups, such as the Figlio della Lupa ('Son of the She-Wolf') for younger children and the Avanguardisti for older boys, who received military training and ideological education. The Balilla was instrumental in creating a highly nationalistic and politically active youth population loyal to Mussolini's regime.

These groups are characterized by their structured, military-like training and indoctrination activities aimed at preparing young people for future roles in the state or party apparatus. These cases had an overwhelming ideological component, designed to instill the dominant ideology of their respective regimes – Fascism in Italy, Communism in the Soviet Union and Nazism in Germany. The primary goal of these organizations was to create loyal followers who would support and perpetuate the regime's goals.

These youth movements provided military-style training to prepare members for potential service in the armed forces. This training included physical fitness, discipline, and sometimes direct military skills such as shooting and marching. Such movements were tools of state mobilization, used to harness the energy and enthusiasm of youth for national projects and to reinforce regime legitimacy. They often involved mass participation in state-sponsored events and public demonstrations of loyalty. By engaging young people in organized activities, these movements helped socialize them into the values and norms of the regime while also exerting control over their social development and interactions.

Under totalitarianism, the Komsomol and Hitlerjugend played crucial roles in shaping the political landscape of their respective countries by ensuring that future generations were aligned with the regime's values and objectives. In doing so, they functioned similarly to paramilitaries, albeit with a focus on youth indoctrination rather than immediate combat roles.

The concept of paramilitary youth organizations intersects with broader discussions on paramilitaries and child soldiers. Paramilitaries are organized groups that are structured similarly to military forces but are not part of the official armed forces. They often operate with some level of state support or approval and can be used for internal security, political repression, or other state interests. Militarized youth movements often serve as feeder systems for paramilitary groups by providing basic military training and ideological indoctrination, preparing young members for future roles in paramilitary or regular military forces.

While militarized youth movements do not typically engage directly in combat like child soldiers (cf. Box 8.5), they share similarities in terms of indoctrination and training. These organizations socialize children into accepting violence and military discipline from a young age, which can blur the lines between youth movements and child soldiering. However, these movements primarily focus on future preparation rather than immediate combat involvement. Also, the recruitment of children is usually by pressuring parents or obligatory participation, not forced abduction.

The dimension of sexual violence is also very different: child soldiers (separated from parents or legal guardians), especially girls, are particularly vulnerable to being forced into sexual slavery. For youth in paramilitaries, there are no data (to my knowledge on systemic sexual violence); also, youth organizations typically segregate sexes. However, where they did not, like when Baldur von Schirach integrated all youth movements into Hitler Youth in order to gain complete control over youth between the ages of ten and eighteen (due to mandatory participation), adolescents also gained newfound independence and freedom in the organization. This led to sexual adventurism and promiscuity: young boys and girls socializing formed sexual relationships; girls frequented train stations and barracks for one-night stands with soldiers, and soon unwanted pregnancies and sexually transmitted diseases (STDs) were on the rise, while homosexuality in the boys' branch of the organization alarmed the leadership (Champion 2023).

In non-totalitarian dictatorships, militarized youth movements can also be seen as part of a broader strategy to maintain power by ensuring loyalty among future generations. The Futuwah ('Youth Vanguard') movement was established in the late 1970s by the Iraqi Ba'ath Party; Ashbal Saddam ('Saddam Lion Cubs') emerged after Iraq's defeat in the 1991 Gulf War. The latter served as a feeder program to the Fedayeen Saddam ('Saddam's Men of Sacrifice'), a paramilitary organization controlled by Saddam's son Uday. In 2015, Russia set up the All-Russian Military Patriotic Social Movement (Юнармия – Yunarmiya), a direct continuation of the Soviet practices but ultra-nationalist.

By instilling ideological conformity from a young age, these regimes aim to create a population that is less likely to challenge their authority. This strategy is similar to the use of foreign recruits or legionnaires by authoritarian regimes to reduce ties between the military and society (like the historical Zulu age regiments, cf. Gump 1988), thereby minimizing the risk of coups and uprisings (coup-proofing). However, save from mandatory enlistment, the motivations behind adolescents' reasons to join such movements are understudied (Muldoon et al. 2008).

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, Jeroen J.J., 2025. Youth Movements as Paramilitary Organizations, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Champion, E.N., 2023. Prudish or Promiscuous? How the Nazis Policed Gender and Sex in the Hitler Youth. Master dissertation, The University of Vermont and State Agricultural College.

Gump, J., 1988. Origins of the Zulu kingdom. The Historian, 50:4.

Gould, J., 1951. The Komsomol and the Hitler Jugend. The British Journal of Sociology, 2:4.

Kater, M.H., 2004. Hitler youth. Harvard University Press.

Koch, H.W., 2000. The Hitler Youth: Origins and Development 1922-1945. Rowman & Littlefield.

Muldoon, O.T., Mclaughlin, K., Rougier, N. and Trew, K., 2008. Adolescents' explanations for paramilitary involvement. Journal of Peace Research, 45:5.

Nasser, S., 2018. Arab nationalism in interwar period Iraq: A descriptive analysis of Sami Shawkat's al-Futuwwah youth movement. Master dissertation, James Madison University.

CHALLENGERS

Anti-Party Candidates

Only dead fish go with the flow – African proverb (according to the Internet)

Anti-party candidates are simply candidates who reject working with parties or an established or institutionalized organization. They are politicians who prefer to subordinate political parties to their personal needs (cf. personalization). Anti-party candidates are connected to anti-establishment discourse and, in some cases, authoritarian populism (populism). These candidates use this type of discourse in order to garner more support from dissatisfied voters. Anti-party candidates describe themselves as outsiders who are acting outside of the system (Schedler 1996; Ignazi 1992). They present themselves as agents of change, with politics as the root of all evil. They are suspicious of institutions, and instead want to personalize them by creating personalized parties (Archer 1992).

Anti-party candidates rise in different ways: some have split from their previous parties, and others gain prominence in regional politics, such as Fernando Collor of Brazil (1990-1992) and Alberto Fujimori of Peru (1990-2000). Some are successful political entrepreneurs who veil their ties with politics in order to launch themselves as independent candidates (i.e., Silvio Berlusconi, Ross Perot, and (when running for his first term) Donald Trump). In some cases, they are just flash candidates who emerge in flash parties that do not last very long. Their emergence is often indicative of weak institutions in new democracies (Cabada & Tomšič 2016).

Anti-party candidates tend to engage in attack politics. They are confrontational and use combative language – such as the rhetoric associated with fighting wars. They also engage in crude and undiplomatic attacks and other aggressive tactics. They may appear to be neutral and above the gridlock of politics but are actually far from it. They can be uncompromising and may be unwilling to be patient enough to work through the rules and institutions that govern democratic processes (Vogelezang 2019). Once in power, they often aim to destroy the democratic institutions that stand in their way and are more interested in repudiating the system (Levitsky & Cameron 2003; Mainwaring 1998; Schedler 1996).

In consolidated democracies, anti-party candidates rarely succeed because strong parties can prevent their rise. In countries with weak parties, the voters are more likely to vote based on image, candidate characteristics and personal connections to a politician rather than based on ideology, making anti-party candidates more common and more successful. Some anti-party candidates do not care about ideology and base the party on their persona, while others have been attracted to populist platforms (Ezrow 2011). Anti-party candidates also rise in instances where the labor sector has become informal, and there are weak connections between parties and labor unions. The spread of mass media, and later, social media, has also incentivized politicians to use their connections with voters to avoid having to rely on a party for their future. Former president Fernando Cardoso once remarked that in Brazil, it is more useful for an aspiring politician to own a TV station than a political party (Sanchez-Sibony 2022 29).

In Russia, in the decade following the breakup of the USSR, parties were weak and had little control over nominations. This allowed many candidates to run and win office as independents, leading to a Duma (parliament) filled with independent candidates (Mainwaring 1998). This made it difficult for Russia ever to establish an institutionalized party system that could meaningfully check the executive (Moser 1995).

Because anti-party politicians are unrestrained by a party, this leads to erratic and disjointed policies. They cannot govern effectively because they are political neophytes. Without political skills and knowledge, they often try to circumvent the political process. In Latin America, anti-party candidates have been frequently elected, leading to ineffective and undemocratic governments (Levitsky & Cameron 2003). When Alberto Fujimori won the election in 1992 in Peru as an anti-system candidate running with a non-party called Cambio 90 (which lacked a platform, base and structure), his main goal was just staying in office. He governed by dismantling institutions that stood in his way such as the legislature and the judiciary, and the opposition parties were too weak to stop him (Levitsky & Cameron 2003).

Anti-party candidates are unable to provide accountability and the systems are too unstable. We can see the effects of this with some examples. Pakistan has struggled with anti-party candidates, as parties embody the personalities of specific politicians. Most recently, Prime Minister Imran Khan was ousted in 2022, joining a long line of Pakistani prime ministers who failed to complete a single five-year term. Thus, anti-party parties and candidates are connected with poor performance of the larger system.

Donald Trump is also an anti-party candidate who decided to run with the Republican Party, requiring total loyalty to him personally, causing the Republican Party to abandon its commitment to its core values. This impact has been long-lasting. A study in the US showed that there has been a 'Trump effect.' Respondents react positively to candidates employing anti-establishment rhetoric. Though voters do not explicitly claim to want this, this translates into voters voting for candidates who are poorly experienced and ill-equipped to govern (Hansen & Treul 2021).

Anti-party candidates are both a consequence and cause of party system decay and volatility: they are a sign of dealignment. As a result of a dealignment, citizens may be less likely to participate in election campaigns. Citizens are also more vulnerable to manipulation and demagogic appeals (Dalton et al. 2000) (cf. Box 4.6). The party is important to habituating the public and politicians to democratic norms and practices of debate and tolerance (Lipset 2000; Randall & Svåsand 2002). With anti-party candidates, the relationships that are critical to democracy between parties and citizens are not able to flourish.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Anti-party Candidates, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Cabada, L. and Tomšič, M., 2016. The rise of person-based politics in the new democracies: The Czech Republic and Slovenia. Politics in Central Europe, 12:2.

Dalton, R.J., McAllister, I. and Wattenberg, M.P., 2000. The consequences of partisan dealignment. In Parties without Partisans: Political Change in Advanced Industrial Democracies, Dalton, R.J. and Wattenberg, M.P., eds., Oxford University Press.

Donovan, T., 2019. Authoritarian attitudes and support for radical right populists. Journal of Elections, Public Opinion and Parties, 29:4.

Ezrow, N., 2011. The importance of parties and party system institutionalization in new democracies.

Hansen, E.R. and Treul, S.A., 2021. Inexperienced or anti-establishment? Voter preferences for outsider congressional candidates. Research & Politics, 8:3.

Ignazi, P., 1992. The silent counter-revolution: Hypotheses on the emergence of extreme right-wing parties in Europe. European Journal of Political Research, 22:1.

Ignazi, P., 1996. The crisis of parties and the rise of new political parties. Party Politics, 2:4.

Kuzio, T., 2003. The 2002 parliamentary elections in Ukraine: Democratization or authoritarianism? Journal of Communist Studies and Transition Politics, 19:2.

Mainwaring, S., 1998. Party systems in the third wave. Journal of Democracy, 9:3.

Moser, R.G., 1995. The impact of the electoral system on post-communist party development: The case of the 1993 Russian parliamentary elections. Electoral Studies, 14:4.
Sanchez-Sibony, O., 2022. Democracy without Parties in Peru: The Politics of Uncertainty and Decay. Springer Nature.
Schedler, A., 1996. Anti-political-establishment parties. Party Politics, 2:3.
Tan, P.J., 2012. Anti-party attitudes in Southeast Asia. In Party Politics in Southeast Asia. Routledge.
Vogelezang, F., 2019. The survival of the 'Anti-Party Party Paradox:' Evidence from the Five Stars Movement. MaRBLe, 1.

Civil Society & NGOs

If we want any significant development, we must co-opt civil society
– Nelson Mandela

Civil society is pivotal in representing individual and collective interests outside the realms of government and business. Encompassing a diverse array of entities, including advocacy groups, grassroots movements, and faith-based organizations, such various entities play a crucial role in shaping public life and promoting societal wellbeing. Among these, non-governmental organizations stand out as organized, mission-driven entities addressing issues like human rights and environmental conservation. The interplay between civil society and political power is complex, as they often collaborate with governments while maintaining independence to ensure democratic accountability. This dynamic relationship is essential for understanding their impact on global governance and policy-making.

SEE ALSO As part of the opposition landscape, civil society is similarly subjected to repression and co-optation by regime actors. While democratization theories have identified a key role for civil society in and after transitions (i.e., democratic consolidation), not all the organizations it encompasses share democratic norms and goals, as shown in the entry on uncivil society.

DEFINITION Civil Society Organizations (CSOs) refer to a broad and comprehensive category that includes all associations that are different from states and able to represent individual and collective interests. It deals with the aggregate of non-governmental organizations, institutions, and individuals that operate outside of the government and the business sector and play a crucial role in shaping public life, addressing political power, and promoting the wellbeing of society. It encompasses a wide range of groups and activities, including advocacy groups, community organizations, grassroots movements, charitable organizations, and faith-based groups.

Among them, Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) are the most organized and purpose-based non-state actors. They are private, non-profit organizations that operate independently of government involvement. These organizations are typically driven by a specific mission or cause and address various social, economic, environmental, and humanitarian issues. NGOs can focus on a wide range of issues, including human rights, democratization, environmental conservation, healthcare, education, poverty alleviation (cf. development), conflict resolutions, and more.

The United Nations (UN) defines civil society as the 'third sector' alongside business and government, whereas the World Bank more specifically includes the wide array of non-governmental and not-for-profit organizations that have a presence in public life, expressing the interests and values of their members or others, based on ethical, cultural, political, scientific, religious, or philanthropic considerations.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE CSOs and NGOs play a key role in complementing governmental efforts in several policy fields. They often work collaboratively with governments, businesses, and other stakeholders to achieve their goals and create positive social impact. In many cases, NGOs and associations may be useful in addressing gaps and in providing a variety of goods, assistance, and social services.

The relationships between NGOs, intergovernmental organizations (IGOs) and states are essential for analyzing the policy-making dynamics at all levels, particularly in sensitive policy fields, where states are dominant actors, like human rights, security and defense, conflict resolution and crisis management and political development, to name only those which are most studied.

NGOs have significant impacts across various policy fields. In international development, they have reinforced their agendas while maintaining links with states and operating within international organizations. Although achieving effectiveness remains challenging, NGO participation can be politically innovative if they maintain independence and neutrality (Irrera 2022).

In migration, especially in Europe, NGOs have been active in assisting migrants and refugees for decades. Partnering with states and EU initiatives, they perform a variety of functions to support vulnerable populations (Irrera 2019; Pries 2018). Scholars highlight the role of intermediaries, often better performed by civil society than the state, in providing goods and services and including marginalized citizens in government programs.

NGOs, in particular, have played an intermediary role for migrants and refugees, facilitating their integration into host communities and mitigating poor governance effects (Ambrosini 2017). This role became crucial during the COVID-19 pandemic when NGOs provided essential services like shelter and food during lockdowns.

NGOs also contribute to strengthening the rule of law and anti-corruption policies. Comparative studies show that external actors often rely on local authorities and political elites for aid policies. Civil society groups and NGOs are vital in democratization efforts and reinforcing the rule of law by acting as both recipients of aid policies and enforcers of compliance with criteria. Understanding the distinction between formal and informal actors is crucial for analyzing post-conflict developments and responses to EU demands.

In hostile or authoritarian climates, NGOs have increasingly taken on innovative roles in intermediation and implementation, stepping into gaps left by states to protect vulnerable populations. The COVID-19 pandemic further legitimized their involvement, opening up spaces for policy debate between state and non-state actors.

A notable development is the emergence of non-governmental 'search and rescue' (SAR) operations in the Central Mediterranean since 2014. Initially complementing EU and state efforts, these operations have evolved into significant humanitarian activities, though they face criticism from populist political elites who view them as facilitating illegal migration.

In conflict zones, NGOs operate under severe security risks, with frequent attacks on humanitarian workers. Despite these dangers, many NGOs persist in their missions, highlighting the critical but precarious role they play in areas where state intervention is limited or absent. This situation underscores the dilemma faced by the humanitarian system: the need for increased civilian expertise amid growing conflicts versus the heightened vulnerability of aid workers.

ORIGIN The study of civil society actors is inherently multidisciplinary, incorporating insights from history, political philosophy, sociology, political science, and international relations (IR). The concept of civil society is multifaceted and challenging to define precisely, adding complexity to analyzing its nature, roles, and impact. A key aspect is understanding the identity of these actors, which include a diverse range of organizations, groups, and individuals outside government and market spheres. Examining their origins, goals, structures, and methods is crucial for evaluating their effectiveness and impact.

The interaction between civil society actors and political power is significant in scholarly analysis. This involves studying how these actors influence political outcomes through advocacy strategies, lobbying efforts, and negotiations with political institutions. The relationship between power and democracy within civil society is critical; scholars explore how civil society actors contribute to democratic processes by representing diverse voices, advocating for human rights, and holding power accountable. However, there is ongoing debate about the challenges civil society faces in maintaining independence while engaging with political power. The risk of co-option and the impact of funding sources are elements that shape this complex relationship.

Over time, the capacity of civil society to maintain independence amid political power has evolved. Historical factors, changes in communication technologies, and shifts in global governance structures influence the dynamics between civil society and political power. Scholars continue to explore these dynamics to deepen understanding of the role and impact of civil society actors in contemporary societies.

LITERATURE Most prominent historians and political philosophers unanimously agree on the fact that the concept of civil society is associated with the non-public sphere (Trentmann 2000; Rosanvallon 2000). Enlightenment thinkers, Locke, Hegel, and de Tocqueville offered distinct perspectives on the relationship between individuals and the state, the nature of political power, and the role of associations in a democratic society. Their ideas have had a lasting impact on political theory, shaping discussions on governance and individual rights.

John Locke (1632-1704) asserted that individuals possess natural rights to life, liberty, and property. Locke argued that people form governments through a social contract to secure these rights and protect themselves from the state of nature's potential chaos. Governments derive their legitimacy from the consent of the governed. The primary purpose of government is to protect individual rights. If a government fails in this duty or becomes tyrannical, individuals have the right to rebel and establish a new government that better safeguards their rights.

Friedrich Hegel (1770-1831) had a different perspective. He emphasized the role of the state in realizing human freedom. He argued that the state is the embodiment of the ethical life of a community and for a close relationship between the individual and the state. In this perspective, the state and civil society should not be completely separated, but the first rather plays a crucial role in fostering ethical development and freedom within civil society.

Finally, Alexis de Tocqueville (1805-1589) explored the nature of democracy in America in his seminal work Democracy in America (1835-1840), observing the importance of voluntary associations in American society, which he believed played a pivotal role in maintaining democracy and preventing the tyranny of the majority.

Voluntary associations, such as community groups and civic organizations, provided a check on the power of the state and allowed individuals to participate actively in civic life. They were the 'habits of the heart' that contributed to the success of democracy by fostering a sense of responsibility and civic engagement among citizens.

In his work The Structural Transformation of the Public Sphere (1962), German philosopher and social theorist Jürgen Habermas delves into the historical development and transformation of the public sphere, examining its role in the legitimization of political power.

The public sphere is a domain in a society where private individuals come together to engage in critical discussion and debate about matters of common concern, serving as a space where citizens can engage in rational-critical debate, express their opinions, and contribute to the formation of public opinion. This is the basis upon which deliberative democracy is grounded, with the legitimacy of political power derived from the free and open deliberation of citizens. Political decisions are considered legitimate when they are the outcome of a communicative process that involves the active participation of citizens.

Habermas expressed concern about the erosion of the public sphere and the diminishing role of citizens in shaping political decisions and used to criticize the tendency of modern societies to be dominated by technocracy and bureaucratic structures, limiting the influence of ordinary citizens. In other words, any limitation to the role of CSOs could represent a challenge to democracy and its legitimacy.

In the IR scholarly community, despite the dominant state-centric views, the role exerted by civil society started to arise in terms of non-state actors. The term non-state actors may be quite general and refers to all actors that are of non-state character, as well as those who are not necessarily structured in an organization. It thus covers a wide range of actors who may offer several identities, interests and needs. International organizations (IOs), lobbies, corporations, NGOs and non-profit organizations can be considered non-state actors because they have members and internal management structure but no territory; they are autonomous but not sovereign and able to influence various policy fields at a global level (Charountaki & Irrera 2022).

When it comes to CSOs, debates are various and passionate. Prominent theoretical schools offer contrasting views on the role of civil society in international relations.

Realists view civil society as a tool of powerful states to advance their interests abroad; liberals perceive it as a positive force contributing to global governance, and Marxists as a potential vehicle for challenging and transforming the existing social and economic order.

The pluralist perspective rather recognizes the diversity of actors and interests in the international system and provides a framework for understanding the complexities of global politics in an era marked by the rise of non-state actors, interdependence, and the emergence of a global society. Theories on international democracy mainly focus on participation, relations with international governmental organizations (IGOs), and the application of human rights and universal principles to the global system. Reflections on how non-state actors can participate more in global policy-making combine with efforts to foster a more just, accountable, and participatory global order.

According to Larry Diamond (1994), a prominent American political scientist, CSOs play essential roles that only they can efficiently fulfill. First, CSOs constrain and limit state power to prevent authoritarianism and abuses, establishing checks and balances, upholding the rule of law, and protecting individual rights to ensure state authority is not unchecked.

CSOs also provide education for democracy, as an informed and educated citizenry is crucial for participating in democratic processes, making informed choices, and holding leaders accountable. This education fosters a culture that values democratic principles. Furthermore, CSOs offer channels for representation. Democratic governance requires mechanisms for citizens to express preferences and have them represented in decision-making processes, such as through free and fair elections, political parties, and institutions that represent diverse societal voices.

Civil society also recruits and trains leaders who understand democratic principles, uphold the rule of law, and are committed to serving the public interest. Additionally, CSOs facilitate conflict mediation and resolution. Constructively managing conflict is vital for democratic stability, requiring institutions and processes that mediate conflicts peacefully to foster social cohesion and prevent violence.

Finally, CSOs enhance accountability and responsiveness by ensuring leaders are accountable for their actions and government institutions respond to citizens' needs. This involves mechanisms like a free press, independent judiciary, and oversight institutions (Diamond 1994).

If Diamond's work contributed to the broader understanding of the conditions necessary for the establishment and maintenance of democratic systems, Samuel Huntington reflected on a nuanced understanding of the complex interplay between political institutions and civil society. A multi-layered civil society, in his view, enhances the vibrancy of political life but also underscores the importance of fostering positive and constructive relations between societal actors and the formal structures of governance. The quality and nature of such relations influence the stability and effectiveness of political institutions. In democratic societies, a healthy and constructive relationship between civil society and political institutions is essential for the functioning of a robust democratic system. A solid democracy requires not only strong and effective political institutions but also an active and multi-layered civil society. A diverse civil society, with various groups and associations representing different interests, can contribute to a more dynamic and responsive political system.

Challenges may arise when the quality of relations between civil society and political institutions is strained. Issues such as corruption, lack of trust, or a weak rule of law can undermine the effectiveness of political institutions and erode public confidence.

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES The participation of NGOs in international institutions and the forms this participation takes is a central topic in theoretical debates. Scholars face significant challenges in studying NGOs and civil society due to the complexity and diversity of their roles. Contrary to the belief that NGOs emerge from declining state sovereignty and maintain independence by avoiding political power, it is argued that these actors, especially NGOs, flourish under stable and effective governance. The dialogue between NGOs and political entities is broad, ranging from friction – where relationships are complex in areas like human rights – to open consultation, where NGOs provide expertise when political power is lacking. Cooperation occurs when both parties benefit: NGOs gain legitimacy and access to funding, while governments enhance representation and accountability.

The roles of NGOs in major global policy fields are part of a broader discussion on civil society's engagement in political participation, representation, and democratizing decision-making processes within IOs. These roles are difficult to measure and investigate due to their multifaceted nature. Global civil society cannot be reduced solely to NGOs, yet understanding it requires recognizing their influence. The practical configurations available to NGOs allow them to structure their interests, define their objectives, and determine how to engage with intergovernmental actors. Relationships with political power – whether positive or negative – have been crucial to the development and implementation of NGOs over the years.

CLASSIFICATIONS & MEASUREMENT Although NGOs typically resist categorization, scholars have developed several classifications, particularly in sensitive policy fields like humanitarian action. NGOs participate in interventions at various levels and interact with other actors within the humanitarian system through different methods. Operational NGOs engage directly in crises by mobilizing resources, implementing projects, and offering expertise. In contrast, campaigning NGOs participate indirectly by garnering public support and fundraising on a smaller scale (Willetts 2001).

Stoddard (2003) identifies three types of NGOs based on identity attributes: (i) Wilsonian organizations – named after President Woodrow Wilson, these NGOs emphasize cooperation and multilateralism with governments and international institutions (e.g., CARE). (ii) Dunantist organizations – named after Henry Dunant, founder of the Red Cross, these NGOs adhere to impartiality, neutrality, and independence (e.g., Médecins Sans Frontières). (iii) Faith-based organizations – these operate in alignment with religious principles (e.g., Christian Aid, Islamic Relief).

Regarding conflict management and humanitarian intervention, NGOs are categorized as: (a) Pragmatist Wilsonian NGOs – likely to work alongside interventions. (b) Principle-centered Dunantist NGOs – participation is contingent upon strict adherence to humanitarian principles. (c) Solidarist NGOs – focused on addressing the root causes of conflict. (d) Faith-based NGOs – guided by values of charity and compassion.

How to cite:

Irrera, Daniela, 2025. Civil Society and NGOs, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Ambrosini, M., 2017. Why irregular migrants arrive and remain: the role of intermediaries. Journal of Ethnic and Migration Studies, 43:11.

Brechenmacher, S., Carothers, T. and Youngs, R., 2020. Civil Society and the Coronavirus: Dynamism Despite Disruption. Carnegie Endowment for International Peace.

Chandler, D.G., 2001. The Road to Military Humanitarianism: How the Human Rights NGOs Shaped a New Humanitarian Agenda. Human Rights Quarterly, 23:3.

Charountaki, M. and Irrera, D., 2022. Mapping Non-State Actors in International Relations. Springer.

Davies, T., ed., 2019. Routledge Handbook of NGOs and International Relations. Routledge.

Diamond, L., 1994. Toward democratic consolidation. Journal of Democracy, 5:4.

Fast, L., 2007. Characteristics, context and risk: NGO security in conflict zones. Disasters, 31:2.

Finnemore, M. and Sikkink, K., 1998. International Norm Dynamics and Political Change. International Organization, 52:4.

Gourevitch, P.A., and Lake, D.A., 2012. Beyond virtue: evaluating and enhancing the credibility of non-governmental organizations. In The Credibility of Transnational NGOs: When Virtue is not Enough, Gourevitch, P.A., and Lake, D.A., eds., Cambridge University Press.

Huntington, S.P., 1965. Political development and political decay. World Politics, 17:3.

Irrera, D., 2013. NGOs, Crisis Management and Conflict Resolution. Edward Elgar Publishers.

Irrera, D., 2018. EU Emergency response policies and NGO: Trends and innovations. Palgrave.

Irrera, D., 2019. NGOs and Security in Conflict Zones. In Routledge Handbook of NGOs and International Relations, Davies, T., ed., Routledge.

Irrera, D., 2019. Non-governmental Search and Rescue Operations in the Mediterranean: Challenge or Opportunity for the EU? European Foreign Affairs Review, 24:3

Irrera, D., 2022. Civil Society and the politics of development. In Handbook on the Politics of International Development, Deciancio, M., Nemiña, P., and Tussie, D., eds., Edward Elgar Publishers.

Krawczyk, K.A., 2019. International NGOs, Transnational Civil Society, and Global Public Policy. In The Oxford Handbook of Global Policy and Transnational Administration, Stone, D., and Moloney, K., eds., Oxford University Press.

Natsios, A.S., 1995. NGOs and the UN system in complex humanitarian emergencies: conflict or cooperation? Third World Quarterly, 16:3.

Pries, L., 2018. Refugees, Civil Society and the State: European Experiences and Global Challenges. Edward Elgar Publishers.

Rosanvallon, P., 2000. Le peuple introuvable: Histoire de la représentation démocratique en France. Gallimard.

Slim, H., 1997. Relief agencies and moral standing in war: Principles of humanity, neutrality, impartiality and solidarity. Development in Practice, 7.

Stoddard, A., 2003. Humanitarian NGOs: challenges and trends. Humanitarian Policy Group (HPG) Briefing.

Trentmann, F., ed., 2000. Paradoxes of civil society: New perspectives on modern German and British history. Berghahn Books.

Tussie, D. and Casaburi, G., 2000. From Global to Local Governance: Civil Society and the Multilateral Development Banks. Global Governance, 6:4.

Willetts, P., 2018. NGOs as insider participants: evolution of the role of NGOs at the United Nations. In Handbook of Research on NGOs, Kellow, A. and Murphy-Gregory, H., eds., Edward Elgar Publishing.

Opposition – Parties & Movements

Opposition is not necessarily enmity; it is merely misused and made an occasion for enmity
– Sigmund Freud

Opposition parties and movements are pivotal in shaping political landscapes by challenging the ruling government's policies and ideologies. They serve as a critical counterbalance, offering alternative visions and representing underrepresented segments of society. Operating within and outside formal political structures, these entities engage in various activities, from participating in elections to organizing protests and civil disobedience. Their significance is highlighted by their role in historical transformations, such as the civil rights movement in the United States and the anti-Apartheid struggle in South Africa. These movements not only advocate for change but also influence global political dynamics by fostering democratic accountability and innovation.

DEFINITION Opposition parties and movements can be defined as those political entities or organized groups that challenge the policies, actions, or ideologies of the ruling government or dominant political forces within a country. They provide an alternative vision, critique the decisions made by those in power, and often seek to represent the interests of segments of the population not adequately served by the ruling party or government. They can arise for various reasons, including political, social, economic, or cultural grievances.

They typically operate within the framework of a country's political system, participating in elections, parliamentary debates, and other political processes. They aim to win public support and, ultimately, gain power to implement their own policies and agendas. Opposition movements, on the contrary, may operate both within and outside formal political structures. They can include grassroots organizations, social movements, advocacy groups, and civil society organizations that mobilize people around specific issues or causes. These movements often use tactics such as protests, demonstrations, petitions, and civil disobedience to raise awareness, pressure the government, and effect change (Maguire 1995; Kolinsky 2016).

SEE ALSO This entry is, of course, directly related to aspects of authoritarian behavior like co-optation and repression. In addition, opposition is fully associated with organizing and mobilizing for protests & uprisings, and it plays a key role in democratization and transitions.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Opposition parties and movements vary widely across different countries and regions, each with unique goals, ideologies, and methods of operation. Civil resistance movements, for example, have been instrumental in achieving significant social and political transformations throughout history, from the civil rights movement in the US to the anti-Apartheid struggle in South Africa (Box 4.7). Nonviolent resistance often attracts broader support, garners sympathy from the international community, and can lead to lasting change without the destructive consequences associated which is usually produced by violent conflict (Schock 2013; Chenoweth 2021).

ORIGIN The study of opposition parties and movements has its roots in political science and sociology, with scholars examining various aspects of political dissent, opposition, and resistance. Further studies, mainly in the IR field, concentrated on civil resistance movements and activism in global issues. The modern study of social movements emerged in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, influenced by scholars such as Max Weber and Emile Durkheim. Theories of class struggle and social change and concepts like authority, bureaucracy and social solidarity contributed to understanding the dynamics of collective action and dissent.

In the twentieth century, Maurice Duverger (1952) and Robert Michels (in Linz 2017) examined the role of political parties in democratic systems, including how opposition parties function within political institutions and compete for power. Comparative politics studies introduced the analysis of political systems, institutions, and behavior across different countries. By using case studies and comparative methods, investigations demonstrated how political dissent varies across cultures, regimes, and historical contexts.

In the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries, Charles Tilly (1998) and Sidney Tarrow (1993) developed the field of contentious politics (cf. Box 5.8), which examines the causes and consequences of political contention, including social movements, protests, and revolutions.

Globalization pushed scholars to shift their focus on transnational movements and activism, which transcend national boundaries and address global issues. This research explores how opposition movements collaborate across borders, leverage new communication technologies, and navigate transnational political networks.

LITERATURE The literature on political parties and movements is vast and encompasses various disciplines such as political science, sociology, history, and anthropology. The issue of political opposition and its various meanings across different political systems has been a topic of ongoing interest and study, albeit with perhaps less advancement compared to other aspects of comparative politics. While Robert Dahl's seminal work in 1965 laid an important foundation for understanding opposition within Western democracies, subsequent studies have expanded the scope to include different political systems and various dimensions of opposition. Other scholars such as Ionescu & Madariaga (1968), Schapiro (1972), Tokes (1979), Kolinsky (1988), and Rodan (1996) have contributed to the field with comparative studies. These works explored aspects of opposition that were not addressed in Dahl's original study, offering insights into how opposition functions within different political contexts beyond Western democracies and the realm of political parties alone.

Despite the passage of time since Dahl's initial work, there is still much to be understood about the nature and role of opposition in political systems worldwide (Blondel 1997). The application of the 'theory of collective action' to understand social movements, particularly those aimed at challenging authorities and addressing grievances, provides a framework for analyzing the dynamics of opposition and political change. This theory identifies several key factors that contribute to the emergence and success of social movements, as well as the interactions between challengers and the authorities.

Specifically, this theory highlights four macro-societal conditions that are conducive to the formation of social movements: dissatisfaction with the status quo, the presence of an ideological framework that motivates action, the capacity to mobilize resources and support, and opportunities for collective action to occur. These conditions set the stage for individuals and groups to engage in various forms of opposition, ranging from conventional methods such as petitions and protests to more unconventional tactics like strikes.

The relevance of expectations regarding the participation of others in collective action is emphasized as well. The decision to engage in opposition activities is influenced by the perceived benefits and costs of participation, which in turn depend on the expectations of how many others will join the movement. This dynamic plays a crucial role in shaping the scale and intensity of social movements. Lastly, the conflict dynamic between challengers and targets, as well as the authorities, manifests in various ways, including negotiations, coercion, and repression. Understanding this dynamic is essential for comprehending the strategies and tactics employed by both sides during opposition movements.

When applied to historical events such as the overthrow of communist regimes in Eastern Europe in 1989, these theories offer insights into how seemingly powerful regimes were toppled by popular movements lacking prior leadership and organization. They also explain the transition to democracy in some cases and the emergence of authoritarianism or xenophobic ultra-nationalism in others, as seen in the breakup of Yugoslavia and subsequent civil war.

Another strand of literature that has added meaningful insights to the notion of participation and opposition is the one about civil resistance (Skilling 1997; Tokes 2016). Even in this case, a wide range of theoretical perspectives, case studies, and analytical frameworks are encompassed by examining the dynamics, strategies, and outcomes of nonviolent resistance movements. Gene Sharp (1973; 1993) is considered one of the pioneers in the study of nonviolent resistance. His books, including The Politics of Nonviolent Action (1973) and From Dictatorship to Democracy (1993), provide comprehensive analyses of the principles, strategies, and tactics of nonviolent resistance movements. Other works have investigated the tactics and strategies employed by the civil rights movement in the US as one of the first examples of nonviolent resistance in challenging systemic oppression (King 1996).

Chenoweth and Stephan (2008) have offered empirical research comparing the effectiveness of violent and nonviolent resistance movements. They argue that nonviolent resistance is often more successful in achieving its objectives than violent insurgency. They define civil resistance as a "Nonviolent resistance is a civilian-based method used to wage conflict through social, psychological, economic, and political means without the threat or use of violence" (Stephan & Chenoweth 2008: 7). The main features of these movements are the absence of physical violence or the threat of physical violence against human beings; the provision of social or political objective and the non-institutional and indeterminate nature.

CLASSIFICATIONS & MEASUREMENT Political opposition includes political parties, factions, or individuals who oppose the policies or actions of the ruling government, offering alternative policies or seeking to replace the ruling party through elections. Social movements are organized groups of people who advocate for social change or protest against globally perceived injustices. Several examples can be investigated. Labor movements often involve labor unions negotiating with employers or staging strikes and protests to achieve their goals. Human rights activists focus on promoting and protecting human rights, as well as the rights of marginalized groups such as refugees, minorities, and Indigenous peoples. In addition, regional or ethnic movements represent the interests of specific regions or ethnic groups within a country, seeking greater autonomy, cultural recognition, or political representation for their communities.

Other groups are committed to the protection of the environment, conservation of natural resources, and action to address climate change or to the promotion of religious freedom and tolerance.

Some of them may represent the interests of specific categories, like student movements, addressing issues such as education reform, student rights, and social justice, and often mobilizing through protests, sit-ins, and other forms of direct action. Others focus on addressing global issues such as poverty, inequality, and injustice and advocate for international cooperation, solidarity among marginalized groups, and systemic reforms to address the root causes of global problems.

They can vary greatly in their goals, strategies, and tactics, but they all play a crucial role in representing interests, promoting social and political change, and holding those in power accountable (Helms 2004; Norton 2013).

Opposition parties and movements can be classified in various ways based on different criteria, including their objectives, strategies, ideological orientations, and organizational structures. The most important and investigated is the last one.

Organizational structure Opposition may be exerted by traditional political parties, which are formal organizations with established leadership structures, membership dues, and hierarchical decision-making processes, by social movements, which are rather informal networks of activists, volunteers, and supporters mobilized around specific causes or grievances, often characterized by decentralized leadership and spontaneous grassroots participation; and civil society organizations, like NGOs, advocacy groups, or professional associations that operate independently of the government and may engage in advocacy, public education, or service delivery (Morris & Braine 2001; Norton 2013).

Strategies Opposition can seek to influence government policies and decisions within the existing political system through legal and institutional channels or fundamentally transform or overthrow the existing political order through radical means, such as mass protests, armed struggle (rebel regimes, terrorist groups), or revolution. Forms of single-issue opposition are also possible, trying to advocate for specific policy changes or addressing a particular social, economic, or environmental issue.

As for strategy, opposition actors mostly operate outside formal electoral processes and utilize tactics such as civil disobedience, protest movements, or grassroots organizing to challenge the ruling authorities. Electoral opposition rather primarily engages in electoral politics, contesting elections to gain political power and influence within the existing democratic framework.

Ideological orientation When it comes to ideological orientation, an opposition can support traditional left-wing principles, like social justice, equality, and progressive reforms, often advocating for policies such as wealth redistribution, social welfare programs, and environmental protection, or right-wing ones, prioritizing free-market principles, and conservative values, advocating for limited government intervention, deregulation, and traditional social norms (Zald 2000; Gillian 2008).

In an increasingly changing environment, however, the centrist opposition, opting for a moderate or pragmatic approach, seeking to balance competing interests and promoting compromise and consensus-building, is not rare.

Scope Lastly, opposition may operate at the national level, seeking to influence policies and decisions of the central government or focus on issues specific to a particular region, city, or locality, often advocating for decentralized governance or autonomy. It can consist of multiple political parties or social movements that form alliances or coalitions to collectively oppose the ruling government or advance shared objectives or rather comprise individual politicians, activists, or organizations that operate autonomously and may not be formally affiliated with any larger coalition or party.

Classifications are not mutually exclusive, and opposition parties and movements often exhibit characteristics that span multiple categories. Additionally, they may vary depending on the specific political context and the criteria used for analysis.

EXAMPLES Several examples have been investigated to illustrate the diversity of opposition movements in terms of their goals, strategies, and historical contexts, as well as their impact on political and social change.

The civil rights movement in the US aimed to end racial segregation and discrimination against African Americans (racism). Led by figures such as Martin Luther King Jr., Rosa Parks, and Malcolm X, the movement utilized nonviolent protests, marches, and civil disobedience to challenge systemic racism and secure legislative victories such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (Morris 1984; Dierenfield 2013).

The Anti-Apartheid Movement in South Africa sought to dismantle the Apartheid system of racial segregation and white minority rule. Led by figures such as Nelson Mandela, the movement employed a combination of nonviolent resistance, international solidarity campaigns, and armed struggle to challenge the Apartheid regime (Box 4.7). It ultimately culminated in the transition to majority rule and the election of Mandela as South Africa's first Black president in 1994 (Seidman 2001; Kurtz 2011).

The Arab Spring refers to a series of pro-democracy uprisings and protests that swept across several countries in the Middle East and North Africa, including Tunisia, Egypt, Libya, Syria, and Yemen. Sparked by grievances over political repression, economic inequality, and corruption, the movement utilized social media and grassroots mobilization to challenge authoritarian regimes and demand political reforms. While the outcomes varied across countries, the Arab Spring led to significant political changes and upheavals in the region (Salamey 2015; Korotayev et al. 2022).

The Hong Kong protests, also known as the Umbrella Movement and later the Anti-Extradition Law Amendment Bill Movement (see also Box 6.4), emerged in response to proposed extradition legislation that would allow individuals to be extradited to mainland China for trial. The movement evolved into a broader pro-democracy and anti-authoritarian movement, with protesters demanding greater autonomy, democratic reforms, and protection of civil liberties. The protests involved mass demonstrations, strikes, and acts of civil disobedience, drawing international attention and sparking debates over Hong Kong's autonomy and China's human rights record (Ortmann 2015; Lee & Chan 2018),

IMPACT ON POLICY Opposition parties and movements play a crucial role in the functioning and consolidation of democracy. They serve as a check on the power of the ruling government by scrutinizing its policies, decisions, and actions. Through parliamentary debates, inquiries, and public criticism, opposition parties hold the government accountable for its conduct, thereby ensuring transparency and accountability in governance. They represent diverse political interests and viewpoints within society that the ruling party may not adequately represent. By providing an alternative political platform and agenda, opposition parties give voice to marginalized groups, ideological minorities, and dissenting opinions, thereby enriching democratic discourse and representation.

Competitive multi-party elections are a hallmark of democracy, and opposition parties provide voters with meaningful choices at the ballot box. By offering alternative candidates and policy proposals, opposition parties foster electoral competition, which incentivizes political parties to respond to the preferences and concerns of voters. The presence of credible opposition parties enhances the legitimacy of democratic elections and governance. When ruling parties win elections in competitive environments with strong opposition, they derive their mandate from a broader segment of the population, increasing their legitimacy and accountability to the electorate (Green-Pedersen & Mortensen 2015).

Opposition parties contribute to policy innovation and debate by proposing alternative solutions to societal problems and challenging the status quo. Through constructive criticism and policy advocacy, opposition parties stimulate public discourse, encourage experimentation with new ideas, and push for reforms that address the needs and aspirations of citizens. Inclusive political competition, where opposition parties have a meaningful opportunity to participate and compete for power, strengthens democratic institutions and fosters political stability. By providing peaceful channels for political dissent and expression, opposition parties mitigate the risk of political polarization, extremism, or authoritarian backsliding (Diani 1997).

In specific contexts marked by transitional democracies or countries undergoing political change, opposition movements often play a central role in challenging authoritarian regimes, mobilizing popular support for democratization, and advocating for political reforms. In post-authoritarian contexts, opposition parties contribute to democratic consolidation by promoting democratic norms, institutions, and practices. On the contrary, they are essential components of active and resilient democracies, contributing to pluralism, accountability, representation, and political innovation. While their relationship with ruling governments may be characterized by conflict and competition, their presence is a requisite for the healthy functioning and sustainability of democratic systems.

NEW FRONTIERS The study of opposition parties and movements is a dynamic field that continues to evolve with new theoretical perspectives, empirical research, and methodological approaches. With increasing globalization and interconnectedness, there is growing interest in understanding how opposition movements operate across national borders. Studies are examining the role of transnational networks, digital platforms, and global solidarity in shaping opposition movements and their impact on international politics. There is a growing recognition of the intersectionality of identity markers such as gender, race, class, ethnicity, and sexuality within opposition movements. Research is exploring how diverse groups mobilize for political change, the challenges they face within broader opposition coalitions, and the strategies for building inclusive and intersectional movements.

The proliferation of social media platforms has transformed the landscape of opposition politics. Scholars are investigating the role of digital activism, online organizing, and social media campaigns in mobilizing support, disseminating information, and challenging authoritarian regimes. This includes studies on online mobilization tactics, the spread of misinformation, and the dynamics of online/offline activism. Especially after COVID-19, research has explored the strategies and tactics employed by authoritarian regimes to suppress opposition movements, as well as the resilience and adaptability of opposition actors in the face of repression. This includes studies on the impact of surveillance technologies, legal constraints on civil liberties, and the effectiveness of nonviolent resistance in challenging authoritarian rule (Chenoweth 2023).

Finally, the emergence of environmental and climate justice movements has brought new attention to the intersections between environmental activism and opposition politics. Scholars are examining how environmental degradation, climate change, and resource extraction fuel social unrest, as well as the role of grassroots movements in advocating for environmental protection and climate justice.

How to cite:

Irrera, Daniela, 2025. Opposition – Parties and Movements, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bermeo, N. and Yashar, D.J., eds., 2016. Parties, Movements, and Democracy in the Developing World. Cambridge University Press.

Blondel, J., 1997. Political opposition in the contemporary world. Government and Opposition, 32:4.

Chenoweth, E., 2023. Can nonviolent resistance survive COVID-19? In Rights at Stake and the COVID-19 Pandemic, Routledge.

Chenoweth, E., 2021. Civil resistance: What everyone needs to know. Oxford University Press.

Dahl, R.A., 1965. Reflections on opposition in Western democracies. Government and Opposition, 1:1.

Diani, M., 1997. Social movements and social capital: a network perspective on movement outcomes. Mobilization: An International Quarterly, 2:2.

Dierenfield, B.J., 2013. The civil rights movement (revised edition). Routledge.

Duverger, M., 1952. Public opinion and political parties in France. American Political Science Review, 46:4.

Gillan, K., 2008. Understanding meaning in movements: A hermeneutic approach to frames and ideologies. Social Movement Studies, 7:3.

Green-Pedersen, C. and Mortensen, P.B., 2015. Avoidance and engagement: Issue competition in multiparty systems. Political Studies, 63:4.

Kiiza, J., 2005. The role of opposition parties in a democracy. Regional Conference on Political Parties and Democratisation in East Africa.

King, R.H., 1996. Civil rights and the idea of freedom. University of Georgia Press.

Helms, L., 2004. Five ways of institutionalizing political opposition: lessons from the advanced democracies. Government and Opposition, 39:1.
Kolinsky, E., 2016. Opposition in Western Europe. Routledge.
Korotayev, A., Issaev, L., Malkov, S. and Shishkina, A., 2022. The Arab Spring. A quantitative analysis. In Handbook of revolutions in the 21st century: The new waves of revolutions, and the causes and effects of disruptive political change. Springer International Publishing.
Kurtz, L., 2010. The anti-apartheid struggle in South Africa (1912-1992). International Center on Nonviolent Conflict.
Lee, F.L. and Chan, J.M., 2018. Media and protest logics in the digital era: The Umbrella Movement in Hong Kong. Oxford University Press.
Linz, J., ed., 2017. Robert Michels, political sociology and the future of democracy. Routledge.
Maguire, D., 1995. Opposition movements and opposition parties: Equal partners or dependent relations in the struggle for power and reform? In The politics of social protest. Routledge.
Morris, A.D., 1984. The origins of the civil rights movement. Simon & Schuster.
Morris, A. and Braine, N., 2001. Social movements and oppositional consciousness. In Oppositional consciousness: The subjective roots of social protest. The University of Chicago Press.
Norton, P., 2013. Making sense of opposition. In Parliamentary Opposition in Old and New Democracies. Routledge.
Oberschall, A., 2000. Social movements and the transition to democracy. Democratization, 7:3.
Ortmann, S., 2015. The Umbrella Movement and Hong Kong's protracted democratization process. Asian Affairs, 46:1.
Salamey, I., 2015. Post-Arab Spring: changes and challenges. Third World Quarterly, 36:1.
Schock, K., 2013. The practice and study of civil resistance. Journal of Peace Research, 50:3.
Skilling, H.G., 1968. Background to the study of opposition in Communist Eastern Europe. Government and Opposition, 3:3.
Stephan, M.J., and Chenoweth, E., 2008. Why civil resistance works: The strategic logic of nonviolent conflict. International Security, 33:1.
Tarrow, S., 1993. Cycles of collective action: Between moments of madness and the repertoire of contention. Social Science History, 17:2.
Tilly, C., 1998. Social movements and (all sorts of) other political interactions-local, national, and international-including identities. Theory and Society, 27:4.
Tokes, R.L., ed., 2016. Opposition in Eastern Europe. Springer.
Weaver, E., and Barnes, W., 2019. Opposition Parties and Coalitions. In Revolution and Counterrevolution in Nicaragua. Routledge.
Zald, M., 2000. Ideologically structured action: An enlarged agenda for social movement research. Mobilization: An International Quarterly, 5:1.

Rebel Regimes

With rebellion, awareness is born
– Albert Camus

Rebel regimes emerge when insurgent groups aim and sometimes successfully overthrow an existing government and establish rule. These regimes are characterized by their unconventional governance structures, often formed in the aftermath of civil conflicts. Rebel regimes are politically motivated entities aiming to establish governance and engage in power-sharing to maintain stability. They may create new political institutions or co-opt existing ones to consolidate power and gain legitimacy. The dynamics of rebel regimes are influenced by factors such as state collapse, external interventions, and resource availability, which can also lead to transformations into or from warlordism.

DEFINITION At its most general, the term rebel regimes might be used to describe a situation where a group that initially rebelled against an existing government has successfully taken control and established its own rule. In such cases, the unconventional or insurgent nature of the governing authority is usually emphasized.

Rebel regimes and warlords differ fundamentally in their motivations and organizational structures. Rebel regimes are politically motivated entities that emerge from organized groups succeeding in civil conflicts, often seeking to establish governance and engage in power-sharing to maintain stability. In contrast, warlords are primarily driven by self-enrichment, thriving in regions where state authority has collapsed. They exert control through violence and patronage without aiming for state-building or providing public goods. While rebel regimes focus on political governance, warlords exploit chaos for personal gain, lacking a coherent political ideology.

The transformation between rebel regimes and warlords, and vice versa, is often driven by the dynamics of state collapse and the shifting political landscape. Rebel regimes can devolve into warlordism when they fail to consolidate power or maintain effective governance, leading to fragmentation and reliance on local strongmen for control. This occurs particularly in environments where central authority is weak or absent, allowing former rebels to operate independently as warlords, prioritizing personal enrichment over state-building. Conversely, warlords can evolve into quasi-state actors or rebel regimes if they manage to consolidate territorial control and gain legitimacy, either through formal integration into state structures or by establishing governance systems. This transition often involves forming alliances with other power brokers and leveraging external support to gain political legitimacy and expand influence. Such shifts are influenced by the broader geopolitical context, including external interventions and the availability of resources, which can either facilitate or hinder these transformations.

SEE ALSO As mentioned, rebel regimes are close but not identical to warlords, and both are associated with state fragility & failure and resource curses.

As a regime type, they are often classified under the umbrella of military regimes in comparative authoritarianism, like in the typology of Hadenius & Teorell, but this, of course, overlooks some of their finer nuances described here. From the perspective of a ruler's background, rebel origins are specific, but their exact influence on governing styles is still being researched.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE At the core of these regimes, political institutions, the bodies, and practices that rebels design and implement to interface with civilian communities may considerably vary, depending on the local contexts and needs. There are various strategies and approaches adopted by insurgent groups when it comes to governance and political organization. Some choose to create inclusive political structures that offer civilians a degree of participation in local governance. This can include mechanisms such as local councils, community assemblies, or participatory decision-making processes. On the other hand, some insurgent groups may opt for a more authoritarian approach, where they administer territories exclusively through their operatives, without involving civilians in decision-making processes. This approach prioritizes control and efficiency but may lead to resentment and opposition from the local population.

Some insurgent movements opt for radical transformation, aiming to replace existing political institutions with entirely new ones that align with their ideology or objectives. This approach seeks to uproot the established order and construct a new system from scratch, often reflecting the insurgents' vision for society. In other cases, groups may choose to co-opt existing governance structures instead of creating entirely new ones. By doing so, they can exploit the legitimacy and administrative capacities of pre-existing institutions. This strategy allows them to minimize disruption and maintain stability, which can be crucial for gaining public support and consolidating power (Kasfir 2015; Cunningham et al. 2021).

The variation in rebel political institutions represents a significant aspect of insurgent dynamics that merits deeper analysis. While ideology and strategic concerns have traditionally received considerable attention in studies of insurgencies, the examination of rebel governance structures adds another layer of complexity to the understanding of these conflicts (Mampilly & Stewart 2021).

The actions and attitudes of civilians are critical in shaping the trajectory of insurgent governance. Civilian behavior in conflict-affected areas can have a profound impact on the effectiveness and sustainability of rebel governance structures. Upon gaining control of territory, insurgent groups often face the immediate challenge of providing basic services to the local population. Failure to address civilian needs can lead to discontent and resistance, undermining the insurgents' legitimacy and stability. By delivering essential services such as food, healthcare, and security, insurgents can build goodwill and support among civilians, enhancing their control over the territory.

The provision of services can serve as a tool for propaganda and social control as insurgents seek to portray themselves as capable and legitimate governing entities. This can be particularly effective in areas where the state has been unable or unwilling to provide for the needs of the population (Mampilly 2017). While addressing immediate civilian needs is crucial for gaining support and legitimacy, the development of political institutions may occur more gradually and be influenced by a range of factors beyond immediate civilian demands. Insurgent leaders may initially focus on addressing immediate needs to gain support and legitimacy, but the establishment of formal political institutions tends to be a more gradual and complex process. A combination of strategic calculations, leadership dynamics, external influences, ideological considerations, and local dynamics often influences this process. As a result, the development of political institutions may reflect the preferences and interests of the insurgent command rather than immediate civilian demands alone.

ORIGIN The study of rebel regimes and institutions has gained increasing attention in recent years within the fields of International Peace and Conflict Studies and International Relations (IR). This growing interest reflects a broader recognition of the significant role that rebel groups play in exercising control and governance in territories where the authority of the nation-state is weakened or significantly limited (Teiner 2022).

The wide variation in the organizational capacity and institutionalization of insurgent groups highlights the need to examine the diverse strategies, structures, and motivations that shape rebel governance dynamics. Despite their shared ability to challenge state authority and engage in armed conflict, insurgent groups can vary significantly in their capacity to govern the territories they control and establish enduring institutions. Examining the variation in organizational capacity and institutionalization among insurgent groups, researchers can gain insights into the factors that shape rebel governance dynamics and their implications for conflict dynamics, state-building, and peace-building efforts (Huang 2016).

The growing frequency of publications in the field of 'Rebel Governance' (Arjona et al. 2015; Péclard & Mechoulan 2015; Albert 2022; Loyle et al. 2023; Pfeifer & Schwab 2023) reflects a broader recognition among scholars of the importance of understanding the dynamics of non-state actors, particularly in conflict settings. This surge in research activity has led to the development of a substantial body of literature that covers a wide range of rebel groups, ideologies, and strategies across different regions of the world. By examining the dynamics of non-state actors such as rebel groups, scholars are contributing to a more holistic understanding of conflict dynamics and informing more effective policy responses to address the root causes of conflict and promote sustainable peace.

The diversity of rebel groups studied in the field of rebel governance underscores the heterogeneous nature of insurgency movements. These movements can vary significantly in terms of their goals, tactics, organizational structures, and levels of institutionalization. Scholars from the IR and Security Studies communities have examined rebel governance in a wide array of contexts, including civil wars, insurgencies, revolutionary movements, and secessionist conflicts, providing valuable insights into the complex interactions between rebel groups, state actors, and local populations (Loyle 2021).

LITERATURE The field of rebel governance benefits from a multidisciplinary approach that incorporates both qualitative and quantitative research methods. Rather than being dominated by one approach over the other, scholars often employ a combination of qualitative and quantitative methods to gain a comprehensive understanding of rebel governance dynamics. This integrative approach allows researchers to capitalize on the strengths of each method and to triangulate findings for more robust conclusions. Mampilly's (2017) focus on qualitative approaches, particularly through in-depth case studies, has provided valuable insights into the complexities of rebel governance. By conducting detailed examinations of specific cases, he was able to uncover nuanced dynamics and mechanisms that may not be captured through quantitative analyses alone. His comparative approach has also allowed for the development of generalizable hypotheses about the factors that impact the effectiveness of rebel governance across different contexts. Qualitative methods, such as case studies, interviews, and participant observation, are well-suited for capturing the intricacies of rebel governance, including the motivations of rebel leaders, the experiences of local populations, and the socio-political dynamics of conflict-affected areas.

Other scholars using qualitative methods focused on delving deep into the governance activities of certain rebel groups, such as the FARC and Taliban (Terpstra 2020), or certain dynamics in insurgents' governance behavior (Schoon 2017; Arjona 2014).

The development and functioning of political institutions within rebel governance represent a significant area of research within the broader study of insurgencies and conflict dynamics. Scholars have sought to understand the dynamics and implications of different organizational structures of insurgent groups, with a particular focus on political institutions. Research in this sub-field often aims to develop typologies of political institutions and organizational structures of insurgent groups, which can enhance our understanding of these phenomena and inform further research (Mampilly & Stewart 2020; Hoffmann & Verweijen 2018; Parkinson & Zaks 2018).

Many other studies centered around how political institutions and organizational structures influence the decision-making processes of rebel groups are crucial for understanding their behavior, military capacities, and overall effectiveness in governance. Studies in this area shed light on how the internal dynamics of rebel groups shape their strategies, tactics, and interactions with external actors (Stewart 2020).

Recent studies have focused on the analysis of Islamist rebel governance, such as the governance of the Islamic State and the Taliban, as well as smaller groups, such as Boko Haram (Keser & Fakhoury 2022). Scholars have analyzed Islamic regional administrative structure and political institutions (Al-Tamimi 2016).

Another strand of literature focuses on the regulations of economic activities in the regions by rebels. By controlling territory and resources, these groups can generate revenue through various means such as taxation, extortion, looting, and even involvement in illicit activities like drug trafficking and smuggling. This financial independence not only helps sustain their operations but also allows them to fund their military endeavors and exert control over the areas they govern (Kasfir 2015; Chojnacki & Branovic 2011).

Comprehensive tax collection is one way in which rebel groups can generate revenue by imposing taxes on local businesses, individuals, and economic activities within the territories they control. This literature intersects with resource curses.

Wickham-Crowley demonstrated how Sendero Luminoso in Peru offered protection from state repression in exchange for taxing local coca farmers (2015). Another example is the Taliban's involvement in protecting poppy farmers and heroin smugglers in Afghanistan. In regions under their control, the Taliban imposed taxes or fees on the cultivation and trafficking of opium poppy and heroin. This practice has been a significant source of income, allowing them to finance their insurgency and governance activities.

The relationship between rebel governance and diplomacy is a complex and multifaceted one. Rebel groups that establish governance structures often seek to leverage their control over territory and populations to enhance their credibility and legitimacy in the eyes of both domestic and international actors. By providing essential services, maintaining security, and exercising some form of authority over the areas they govern, rebel groups can present themselves as viable political entities worthy of recognition and engagement. This enhanced reputation can strengthen their bargaining position in negotiations with state governments or international actors as they demonstrate their ability to govern and their willingness to engage in diplomatic processes. Rebel groups may use their governance activities as bargaining chips to secure concessions, political recognition, or even power-sharing agreements in peace negotiations (Worrall 2017; Staniland 2021).

CLASSIFICATIONS & METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES The informal nature of many rebel actions, including the establishment of ad hoc institutions, presents difficulties in systematic observation. These ad hoc institutions may operate discreetly to avoid detection or may dissolve after completing a specific task, making them challenging to identify and study. When mapping these, even discerning between ad hoc institutions that are consistently reconstituted for recurring tasks and those that are more temporary can be tricky.

Rebel political institutions are classified according to different criteria and factors. Institutions can vary in form and function, often resembling traditional nation-state structures like parliaments and political parties. They may also appropriate existing sources of authority, such as chiefs or civilian councils, or depart from conventional institutional forms altogether. Political institutions can also be distinguished from other aspects of governance, such as social service provision. They primarily deal with agenda-setting, policy-making, and administration, while social service institutions focus on implementing policies decided within political institutions, and judicial institutions enforce and adjudicate these policies (Stewart 2018; Loyle 2021).

The choices that rebel groups make regarding their political institutions have significant implications both domestically and beyond the theater of conflict. At the domestic level, rebel political institutions often serve as vehicles for advancing the long-term political objectives of the group and are instrumental in articulating and implementing the rebel group's vision for governance, autonomy, or independence. They act as the primary interface between rebel organizations and civilians, as well as local elites such as traditional chiefs, businesspersons, religious leaders, and civil society organizations. Moreover, the distribution of resources and access to power within rebel-held territories is influenced as well, as institutions affect the dynamics of governance, including how public goods and services are provided to the population.

On an international level, external actors, including states, international organizations, and NGOs, often assess the legitimacy of rebel groups based on their political institutions and governance structures. Well-functioning political institutions can enhance a rebel group's credibility and standing in diplomatic negotiations, peace talks, and other international forums. Conversely, dysfunctional or illegitimate political institutions may undermine the rebel group's international reputation and support. Rebel political institutions also impact economic relations with multinational corporations and other business entities. The stability and transparency of governance structures can influence investment decisions and the willingness of corporations to engage in trade or business activities within rebel-held territories.

With respect to political regimes and relations with locals, Mamphilli and Stewart (2021) offered an analysis based on four (A-D) different dimensions: The first one is power-sharing (A), whether rebels choose to enforce martial law or to share power to some degree with locals. While some rebel organizations exercise absolute military control over civilian life, others may opt for governance systems that involve power-sharing arrangements with civilian institutions and leaders, especially in more complex conflicts, whereas rebel groups make pacts with civilian leaders or factions. These agreements may involve the allocation of specific roles and responsibilities to different parties, with the aim of fostering cooperation and stability within rebel-held territories.

The second dimension (B) refers to integration, to the extent and nature of collaboration between rebels and civilians in the execution of governance and administration within a territory. This dimension can vary along a spectrum, from maximal integration to minimalist integration. At the maximal end of the integration spectrum, rebels and civilians collaborate extensively in governing a locality. This collaboration can cover a wide range of issue areas, including women's liberation, social regulation, and political reform. For example, rebel political cadres may work closely with preexisting traditional chiefs or form representative councils comprising various civilian constituencies to govern alongside the rebel group. The more issues on which rebels and civilians collaborate, the more integrated the rebel political arrangements are.

On the minimalist end of the integration spectrum, rebels may set strict behavioral parameters primarily related to security but otherwise allow civilians to operate freely in governance decisions. In this scenario, civilians have relative autonomy over governance matters but must adhere to rebel stipulations regarding security and other priority areas. While civilian governance is partially subject to rebel rules, it remains largely autonomous from direct rebel control.

The innovation dimension (C) in rebel governance focuses on the extent to which rebels transform preexisting political structures and practices within the territories they control. Unlike integration, which deals with power-sharing across governance issue areas, innovation pertains to the degree of transformation within political institutions themselves. Some rebel groups opt to maintain existing political institutions, either wholly or partially, with minor adjustments made for strategic or efficiency purposes. This approach may involve replacing or appointing supportive personnel within these institutions to align them with rebel political objectives. Alternatively, rebels may retain existing personnel with assurances that they will not oppose the rebellion's interests. This is often seen in situations where preexisting political institutions have been weakened by neglect or systemic corruption prior to the arrival of the rebels.

On the opposite end of the spectrum, others choose to transform the political institutions they encounter fundamentally. This can involve introducing entirely new institutions or revitalizing existing ones in ways that significantly depart from their previous functions. In such cases, rebels do not merely modify existing political structures for tactical reasons but seek to establish entirely new political arrangements from the ground up.

Lastly, the inclusiveness dimension (D) in rebel governance focuses on the extent to which rebel groups structure political institutions to facilitate civilian participation. This dimension encompasses various forms of participation, including voting in local elections, running political wings, and influencing the operation of political institutions. Inclusiveness can be understood in terms of the opportunities provided for different demographic groups, considering factors such as class, gender, ethnicity, and religion.

Some rebel groups actively promote civilian participation by providing opportunities for various demographic groups, including those historically marginalized from power. This may involve establishing specific structures such as women's organizations, student groups, or labor unions to facilitate participation by women, youth, and religious or ethnic minorities.

On the less inclusive end of the spectrum, rebel groups may restrict participation to economic and political elites or representatives of privileged groups such as religious or traditional leaders. In such cases, governance and decision-making processes may involve only a small percentage of the overall population, excluding broader segments of society.

MEASUREMENT Older datasets gathered information about non-state actors in general (Cunningham et al. 2013), with the aim of gauging rebel groups' motivations and strategies (Fjelde & Nilsson 2012) or to assess why ethnic groups chose the rebel path using the Ethnic Power Relations (ERT) database (1946-2005) (Cederman et al. 2010).

Recently, new datasets have emerged, mapping rebel strength and rebel governance institutions, like the Rebel Quasi-State Institutions dataset (Stewart 2020), which covers 235 rebel groups and codes annually for 25 institutions during the entire existence of the group. Additionally, the Foundations of Rebel Group Emergence (FORGE) dataset (Braithwaite & Cunningham 2020) looks at the pre-existing 'parent' societal organizations that are merged or co-opted by rebel groups. FORGE thus studies the founding processes that gave rise to rebel groups active between 1946 and 2011 in intrastate conflicts. Lewis (2023) challenges the urban origins of most rebel movements and their reliance on previous organizations with her new dataset on rebel group formation in 47 African states (1997-2015).

New datasets further break open the black box of such movements: Lutmar and Terris (2019) look at leadership change within rebel groups; Haer & Böhmelt (2018) at girl soldiers; Walsh et al. (2023) at the illicit sources of funding; Pamp et al. (2024) track their military capabilities in the Rebels' Armament Dataset (RAD), and Schwartz (2024) the presence of foreign fighters in the Rebel Foreign Fighter Dataset (RFFD).

EXAMPLES Although the concept of 'rebel regimes' can vary based on perspective and context, some examples can be more visible than others.

The Taliban governed Afghanistan from 1996 to 2001 after seizing control of most of the country. While they were ousted from power by the US-led invasion in 2001, they continued to operate as an insurgency and regained control over much of Afghanistan by 2021, overtaking the state.

The Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC) was a Marxist-Leninist guerrilla group that waged a long insurgency against the Colombian government. It aimed to overthrow the government and establish a communist state. After peace negotiations, FARC disarmed in 2017 and transformed into a political party.

The Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) is a Kurdish militant and political organization that has fought for Kurdish autonomy in Turkey since the 1980s. The Turkish government and several other countries consider it a terrorist organization due to its violent tactics, including bombings and assassinations.

During the Libyan civil war in 2011, the National Transitional Council (NTC) emerged as a rebel coalition opposed to the regime of Muammar al-Qaddafi, able to eventually overthrow Qaddafi's government and assumed control of Libya.

The Revolutionary United Front (RUF) established control over significant portions of Sierra Leone during the civil war in the 1990s. The RUF engaged in widespread atrocities, including the use of child soldiers (Box 8.5) and brutal mutilations. The conflict eventually ended with the intervention of international peacekeepers. Examples illustrate the diverse nature of rebel regimes, which can range from Islamist extremist groups to nationalist movements seeking self-determination or regime change. Each case represents a unique context with its own political, social, and historical dynamics.

IMPACT ON POLICY The level of local support plays a crucial role in shaping rebel political arrangements. When rebels enjoy significant local support and share political leanings with civilians, they are more likely to collaborate with them to pursue common goals cooperatively. This collaboration can lead to the establishment of political institutions where civilians have a substantial role in governance decisions. However, in situations where rebels lack local support, they may resort to strategic co-optation of key civilian institutions with minimal direct involvement in civilian governance decisions. This approach allows rebels to maintain control and influence while minimizing resistance from the local population. This form of governance can be characterized by partial subjugation of civilian institutions to rebel authority.

The example of certain towns under the rule of Islamic State in Iraq and the Levant (ISIL, also referred to as ISIS, Islamic State of Iraq and Syria, cf. Islamic states) illustrates this dynamic. While some areas experienced forms of rule closer to martial law, others witnessed the strategic co-optation of key civilian institutions with limited direct involvement by ISIL in civilian governance decisions. This approach allowed ISIL to maintain control over these territories while exploiting existing structures for governance and administration. The approach described by Weiss & Hassan (2016) regarding ISIL's governance in certain captured areas reflects a strategy of decentralized administration, where local forces and their networks are entrusted with day-to-day administrative tasks. In these areas, ISIL aimed to minimize direct involvement in local affairs, allowing local actors to handle administrative responsibilities under the broader framework of ISIL control. For example, ISIL refrained from micromanaging towns and delegated day-to-day administrative affairs to local forces and their relatives, established a police force and security operation stations to maintain law and order within the captured areas, and implemented a Shariah-based court system to adjudicate legal matters and enforce punishments according to its interpretation of Islamic law. Public punishments were often carried out in town squares to intimidate and control the local population (cf. terror in Box 3.13). This approach allowed rebels to focus their resources and attention on strategic objectives while relying on local collaborators to manage day-to-day affairs. However, it also led to variations in governance practices across different areas under ISIL control, depending on the capabilities and agendas of local actors.

NEW FRONTIERS As rebel governance has evolved as a discipline, a few strands of research have become increasingly interesting and promising in the long term. The first one is the analysis of social service provision. While rebel groups may initially prioritize military goals, such as securing territory or resources, they often find it necessary to engage in social service provision to gain support and legitimacy from local populations. However, the provision of social services does not necessarily equate to the establishment of robust political institutions. Rebel groups may deliver basic services as a means of control or coercion rather than as a genuine effort to govern effectively. The transition from addressing immediate military concerns to longer-term political objectives is influenced by various factors, including internal dynamics within the rebel group, external pressures from actors such as funders or supporters, and shifts in the broader conflict environment (Nexon & Wright 2007).

The methodological challenges mentioned higher underscore the complexities involved in accurately documenting and understanding the practices of rebel governance. Their informal nature, i.e., the difficulty in distinguishing between ad hoc institutions (consistently reconstituted) for recurring tasks and those that are more temporary inventions – and thus understanding why rebels choose to formalize certain political institutions while keeping others informal is essential for assessing their civilian governance patterns in light of their broader military struggle. Further scholarship should delve into the strategic, operational, and contextual factors that influence these decisions, providing insights into the dynamics of rebel governance and its implications for conflict dynamics and resolution.

Finally, the enduring impact of political mobilization and inclusive governance, once established during the conflict, is also an important area for future research. While rebel groups may initially mobilize communities for their own political goals, the relationships and structures formed during this process can persist beyond the end of the conflict. Understanding how these processes of political interaction shape postwar political behavior is crucial for comprehending the long-term consequences of conflict and for designing effective post-conflict reconstruction and peace-building efforts.

By investigating the continuity of political mobilization and governance practices from the conflict period into the postwar era, researchers can shed light on the mechanisms through which conflict legacies persist and shape post-conflict societies. This knowledge can inform interventions aimed at promoting reconciliation, democratic consolidation, and sustainable peace-building processes in societies transitioning from conflict to peace.

How to cite:

Irrera, Daniela, 2025. Rebel Regimes, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Albert, K.E., 2022. What is rebel governance? Introducing a new dataset on rebel institutions, 1945-2012. Journal of Peace Research, 59:4.

Al-Tamimi, A.J., 2016. A caliphate under strain: The documentary evidence. CTC Sentinel, 9:4.

Arjona, A., 2014. Wartime institutions: A research agenda. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 58:8.

Arjona, Ana, Nelson Kasfir, and Zachariah Cherian Mampilly, eds., Rebel governance in civil war. Cambridge University Press, 2015.

Braithwaite, J.M. and Cunningham, K.G., 2020. When organizations rebel: introducing the foundations of rebel group emergence (FORGE) dataset. International Studies Quarterly, 64:1.

Cederman, L.E., Wimmer, A. and Min, B., 2010. Why do ethnic groups rebel? New data and analysis. World politics, 62:1.

Chojnacki, S. and Branovic, Z., 2011. New modes of security: The violent making and unmaking of governance in war-torn areas of limited statehood. In Governance without a state? Policies and politics in areas of limited statehood, Risse, T., ed., Columbia University Press.

Cunningham, D.E., Gleditsch, K.S. and Salehyan, I., 2013. Non-state actors in civil wars: A new dataset. Conflict management and peace science, 30:5.

Cunningham, K.G., Huang, R. and Sawyer, K.M., 2021. Voting for militants: Rebel elections in civil war. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 65:1.

Fjelde, H. and Nilsson, D., 2012. Rebels against rebels: Explaining violence between rebel groups. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 56:4.

Haer, R. and Böhmelt, T., 2018. Girl soldiering in rebel groups, 1989-2013: Introducing a new dataset. Journal of Peace Research, 55:3.

Hoffmann, K. and Verweijen J., 2018. Rebel rule: A governmentality perspective. African Affairs, 118:471.

Huang, R., 2016. The wartime origins of democratization: Civil war, rebel governance, and political regimes. Cambridge University Press.

Kasfir, N., 2015. Rebel governance–constructing a field of inquiry: definitions, scope, patterns, order, causes. Cambridge University Press.

Keser, A. and Fakhoury, F., 2022. Hay'at Tahrir Al-Sham (HTS) from an insurgent group to a local authority: Emergence, development and social support base. Studies in Conflict & Terrorism.

Lewis, J.I., 2023. Rebel group formation in Africa: Evidence from a new dataset. World Development, 170.

Loyle, C.E., 2021. Rebel justice during armed conflict. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 65:1.

Loyle, C.E., and Binningsbø, H.M., 2018. Justice during armed conflict: A new dataset on government and rebel strategies. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 62:2.

Loyle, C.E., Cunningham, K.G., Huang, R. and Jung, D.F., 2023. New directions in rebel governance research. Perspectives on Politics, 21:1.

Lutmar, C. and Terris, L.G., 2019. Introducing a new dataset on leadership change in rebel groups, 1946-2010. Journal of Peace Research, 56:2.

Mampilly, Z. and Stewart, M.A., 2021. A typology of rebel political institutional arrangements. Journal of Conflict Resolution, 65:1.

Mampilly, Z.C., 2017. Rebel rulers: Insurgent governance and civilian life during war. Cornell University Press.
Meng, A. and Paine, J., 2022. Power sharing and authoritarian stability: How rebel regimes solve the guardianship dilemma. American Political Science Review, 116:4.
Nexon, D.H. and Wright, T., 2007. What's at stake in the American empire debate. American Political Science Review, 101:2.
Pamp, O., Mehltretter, A., Binder, P. and Thurner, P.W., 2024. Introducing the Rebels' Armament Dataset (RAD): Empirical Evidence on Rebel Military Capabilities. Journal of Conflict Resolution.
Parkinson, S.E. and Zaks, S., 2018. Militant and rebel organization(s). Comparative Politics, 50:2.
Péclard, D. and Mechoulan, D., 2015. Rebel governance and the politics of civil war. Schweizerische Friedensstiftung (Swisspeace) working paper, 1.
Pfeifer, H. and Schwab, R., 2023. Politicising the rebel governance paradigm. Critical appraisal and expansion of a research agenda. Small Wars & Insurgencies, 34:1.
Schoon, E.W., 2017. Building legitimacy: Interactional dynamics and the popular evaluation of the Kurdistan Workers' Party (PKK) in Turkey. Small Wars & Insurgencies, 28:4-5.
Schwartz, J., 2024. The Rebel Foreign Fighter Dataset. Journal of Peace Research, 61:5.
Staniland, P., 2021. Ordering violence: Explaining armed group-state relations from conflict to cooperation. Cornell University Press.
Teiner, D., 2022. Rebel governance: a vibrant field of research. Zeitschrift für Politikwissenschaft, 32:3.
Terpstra, N., 2020. Rebel governance, rebel legitimacy, and external intervention: assessing three phases of Taliban rule in Afghanistan. Small Wars & Insurgencies, 31:6.
Walsh, J.I., Conrad, J.M., Whitaker, B.E. and Hudak, K.M., 2018. Funding rebellion: The rebel contraband dataset. Journal of Peace Research, 55:5.
Weiss, M. and Hassan, H., 2016. ISIS: Inside the Army of Terror (updated edition), Simon & Schuster.
Wickham-Crowley, T., 2015. Del Gobierno de Abajo al Gobierno de Arriba... and back: Transitions to and from rebel governance in Latin America, 1956-1990. In Rebel Governance in Civil War, Arjona, A., Kasfir, N., and Mampilly, Z., eds., Cambridge University Press.
Worrall, J., 2017. (Re-)emergent orders: Understanding the negotiation(s) of rebel governance. Small Wars & Insurgencies, 28:4-5.

Box 8.5 Child Soldiers

Being a child soldier was like being ripped from childhood and thrown into an adult world.
– Junior Nzita Nsuami, former child soldier from the DRC

Without a special nickname in Spanish, Niños soldados (child soldiers) are referred to as Kadogo or Tchakatou ('little ones' in Swahili or Lingala, respectively), Talibé in Mali (from Arabic/French – a pupil of (Islamic) schools) and Doria (in Kirundi – 'ear agent') as the latter was mostly used for intelligence gathering.

Child soldiers are usually defined as any child under 18 years of age who is involved in any irregular or regular armed force or armed group in any capacity (Bakaki & Hinkkainen 2016). Child soldiers do not have to be directly involved in armed conflict. They may serve as cooks, mail deliverers, or informants (Burgess 2009), while underage girls may usually serve as sex workers, causing their further stigmatization (Uppard 2003). Chapleau (2018: 241-242) identifies several reasons for the recruitment of child soldiers: (i) they represent a considerable human resource, (ii) they are inexpensive, (iii) versatile, and (iv) they can be easily controlled, particularly through brainwashing, threats, or drugs. Additionally, (v) child soldiers are often seen as amoral and (iv) can function as incapacitating weapons (rendering opponents unable to shoot at them). Tynes and Early (2015) further developed and tested a theory on the recruitment of child soldiers, arguing that they are used strategically by governments and rebel groups as tactical weapons. Contrary to much of the existing literature, they found that sociodemographic factors are not the primary drivers behind the recruitment of children into armed conflicts.

Children engage with military groups for the following reasons: (a) due to local values and traditions related to defending their kin, (b) for economic reasons, and (c) as a survival strategy (Hart 2006: 218-219). For them, the decision to join armed groups is often a consequence of economic, cultural, social, or political deprivation. Many child soldiers come from rural areas controlled by militias. Jason Hart (2006) explores the issue of child soldiers within the broader concept of childhood, addressing ethical dilemmas in how children are treated in wars. Jo de Berry (2001) argues that the use of child soldiers must be understood within the strategy of civil wars, where civilians are used to secure political control (cf. Kaldor et al. 1997), as well as within the context of state crises manifested in civil conflicts (de Berry 2001; cf. Richards 2008, for the case of Sierra Leone). The agency of children in their involvement in armed conflicts is also a topic of academic discussion. According to Singer (2005: 61), approximately two out of three child soldiers demonstrated some degree of initiative in their recruitment. Dawes (1990) examines children's involvement in armed conflict as stemming from the normalization of violence as an acceptable means of resolving political disputes. Sarah Uppard (2003) suggests that children may view their participation in armed groups as a survival strategy.

The issue of child soldiers in the context of humanitarian law is analyzed inter alia by G. Alex Sinha (2013) and David M. Rosen (2007). The use of child combatants in the fighting is against the provisions of the United Nations Convention on the Rights of the Child (CRC), adopted in 1989 and ratified by almost all members of the international community. The prevention of children's active participation in armed conflicts is anchored in Article 38 of the Convention, stating that "Parties should take all feasible measure[s] to ensure that persons who have not attained the age of fifteen years do not take a direct part in hostilities" (UN, 1989). The possibilities of implementing this article in the case of the Ugandan civil war are presented by de Berry (2001). Recruiting child soldiers is considered a violation of international law and is punishable as a war crime by the International Criminal Court (ICC) (Bakaki & Hinkkainen 2016; Jørgensen 2012). Bakaki and Hinkkainen (2016) argue that the recruitment of child soldiers by conflict parties makes the perception of such conflicts more severe. Therefore, it is more likely for UN peacekeeping forces to be deployed. Samaila Oluwatope Adelaiye and Mehwish Sarwari (2023) found out that conflicts with the involvement of child soldiers are likely to receive more mediation from democratic states as the use of child soldiers is considered inhuman.

Child soldiers have been the focus of various UN bodies. The UNSC established the Working Group on Children and Armed Conflict in 2005 as a reaction to horrendous news about the scale of children's involvement in armed conflicts around the world (Østby et al., 2023). Besides that, child soldiers have been the focus of the United Nations International Children's Emergency Fund (UNICEF). The definition of child soldiers was provided in Cape Town Principles adopted in 1997, which set the legal age for being considered a child soldier to eighteen years (Chapleau 2018). In 2007, the UN member states adopted the Paris Principles and Commitments on Children Associated with Armed Forces or Armed Groups to combat the unlawful recruitment of children in armed conflicts (UNICEF 2007). In 2017, The government of France and UNICEF, in collaboration with the Paris Principles Steering Group (PPSG), co-hosted the conference 'Protect Children from War.' Even though the recruitment of child soldiers by state actors has dropped significantly since the international ban on using children in armed conflict as an issue by the Cape Town Principles, the recruitment of children by non-state actors, especially terrorist groups, is still on the rise (Chapleau 2018). The Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration (DDR) process is a rehabilitation program that typically begins after a peace agreement is signed. During this process, children and their families are supported in their transition and adaptation to civilian life (Uppard 2003). Former child soldiers often suffer from post-traumatic stress disorder (PTSD) and require assistance in their rehabilitation and reintegration into society (Hermenau et al. 2013; Kanagaratnam et al. 2005; Uppard 2003).

Considering the influence of child soldiers on the duration and severity of conflicts, Haer and Böhmelt (2017) argue that the involvement of child soldiers increases the strength of rebel organizations fighting against governments (see also Haer & Böhmelt 2016) and therefore, in fact, prolongs the civil wars. They provide evidence by the quantitative analysis of post-1989 civil conflicts. On the contrary, as suggested in Lasley & Thyne (2015), separatist rebellions do not usually use child soldiers as it would undermine their possibilities to achieve international recognition.

Østby et al. (2023) claim, based on a statistical analysis of the data on child soldiers' recruitment, that the global share of children at risk of being recruited as a combatant has steadily increased over the past 30 years. Child soldiers as combatants in the conflicts have been identified, e.g., in Sierra Leone (Zack-Williams 2001; Richards 2008; Jørgensen 2012), the DRC (Hermenau et al. 2013; Mwandumba 2013), Uganda (De Berry 2001; Blattman & Annan 2010; Corbin 2008), Sri Lanka (Harendra De Silva 2013), and Colombia (Burgess 2009).

Burgess (2009) argues, based on participant observation and interviews with twelve at-risk children from marginalized communities in Colombia, that community-based psychosocial pedagogy is crucial in addressing the factors these children have to face. Besides that, he stresses the teacher's role within non-formal education programs and maintaining a relationship with children affected by violence. Blattman and Annan (2010) discuss the impact of military service on children in Uganda, particularly in relation to their involvement in the labor market and education. Joanne Corbin (2008) presents an explanatory qualitative study based on thematic analysis of narrative data that explores the return of child soldiers to their families gathered during fieldwork in Uganda. Alcinda Honwana (2006) offers a comprehensive study on the impact of civil wars in Mozambique and Angola, focusing not only on the direct involvement of children in armed groups but also on orphans and land mine victims affected by the wars.

Considering case studies of child soldier involvement in specific conflicts, Children and War: A Historical Anthology, edited by James Marten (2002), presents notable historical examples of the use of child soldiers in various wars. Zack-Williams (2001) analyzes the factors that led child soldiers to fight in Sierra Leone's civil war, arguing that social and economic factors, such as poverty among street children in urban areas and the provision of surrogate family relationships by militias, primarily drive recruitment. De Berry (2001) attributed the involvement of child soldiers in Uganda's civil war to the collapse of democratic state institutions and the transfer of power to ethnically-based armed groups. Murphy (2003) applied the concept of neo-patrimonialism to describe the role of children in conflicts in Liberia and Sierra Leone, developing a clientelist model to explain their behavior. He examined patrimonial ties within rebel regimes, identifying relations of domination and reciprocity between child soldiers and military commanders. Youth clientelism, according to Murphy, emerged as a consequence of the 'shadow state' in Sierra Leone (see Reno 1995), where the state failed to provide security, forcing youth to rely on powerful figures or 'big men' for protection.

Haer (2019) highlighted that research on child soldiers has primarily been conducted by members of think tanks and civil society organizations rather than academics and that the literature on the subject remains relatively sparse. She identifies three underdeveloped areas within child soldier studies: (a) the involvement of girl soldiers in combat roles, (b) the distinction between forced and voluntary recruitment, and (c) the effectiveness of the international response. Østby et al. (2023) further emphasized the limitations in data collection on child soldiers at regional and local levels, stressing the need for more focused research on the recruitment process.

How to cite:

Ženková Rudincová, Kateřina, 2025. Child Soldiers, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adelaiye, S.O. and Sarwari, M., 2023. Responding to child soldiering: When the presence of child soldiers attracts mediation from democratic regimes. Journal of Intervention and Statebuilding, 17:5.

Bakaki, Z. and Hinkkainen, K., 2016. Do child soldiers influence UN peacekeeping? International Peacekeeping, 23:4.
Blattman, C. and Annan, J., 2010. The consequences of child soldiering. The Review of Economics and Statistics, 92:4.
Burgess, R., 2009. Colombia's children at risk of recruitment into armed groups: Exploring a community-based, psychosocial pedagogy. Journal of Education for International Development, 4:1
Chapleau, P., 2018. Child soldiers, not very minor weapons of destruction. Inflexions, 37:1.
Corbin, J.N., 2008. Returning home: Resettlement of formerly abducted children in Northern Uganda. Disasters, 32:2.
Dawes, A., 1990. The effects of political violence on children: A consideration of South African and related studies. International Journal of Psychology, 25:1.
de Berry, J., 2001. Child soldiers and the Convention on the Rights of the Child. The Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, 575:1.
Haer, R. and Böhmelt, T., 2016. The impact of child soldiers on rebel groups' fighting capacities. Conflict Management and Peace Science, 33:2.
Haer, R. and Böhmelt, T., 2017. Could rebel child soldiers prolong civil wars? Cooperation and Conflict, 52:3.
Haer, R., 2019. Children and armed conflict: Looking at the future and learning from the past. Third World Quarterly, 40:1.
Harendra De Silva, D.G., 2013. The use of child soldiers in war with special reference to Sri Lanka. Paediatrics and International Child Health, 33:4.
Hart, J., 2006. The politics of "child soldiers." The Brown Journal of World Affairs, 13:1.
Hermenau, K., Hecker, T., Maedl, A., Schauer, M. and Elbert, T., 2013. Growing up in armed groups: Trauma and aggression among child soldiers in DR Congo. European Journal of Psychotraumatology, 4:1.
Honwana, A., 2006. Child soldiers in Africa. University of Pennsylvania Press.
Jørgensen, N.H.B., 2012. Child soldiers and the parameters of international criminal law. Chinese Journal of International Law, 11:4.
Kaldor, M., Vashee, B., and World Institute for Development Economics Research, eds., 1997. Restructuring the global military sector. Pinter.
Kanagaratnam, P., Raundalen, M. and Asbjørnsen, A.E., 2005. Ideological commitment and posttraumatic stress in former Tamil child soldiers. Scandinavian Journal of Psychology, 46:6.
Lasley, T. and Thyne, C., 2015. Secession, legitimacy and the use of child soldiers. Conflict Management and Peace Science, 32:3.
Marten, J.A., ed., 2002. Children and war: A historical anthology. New York University Press.
Murphy, W.P., 2003. Military patrimonialism and child soldier clientelism in the Liberian and Sierra Leonean civil wars. African Studies Review, 46:2.
Mwandumba, J.V., 2013. Children on the battlefield: A look into the use of child soldiers in the DRC conflict. Southern African Peace and Security Studies, 2:2.
Østby, G., Rustad, S.A., Haer, R., and Arasmith, A., 2023. Children at risk of being recruited for armed conflict, 1990-2020. Children & Society, 37:2.
Reno, W., 1995. Corruption and state politics in Sierra Leone. Cambridge University Press.
Richards, P., 2008. Fighting for the rain forest: War, youth & resources in Sierra Leone. International African Institute in association with Currey.
Rosen, D.M., 2007. Child soldiers, international humanitarian law, and the globalization of childhood. American Anthropologist, 109:2.
Singer, P. W. 2005. Children at War. Pantheon Books.
Sinha, G.A., 2013. Child soldiers as super-privileged combatants. The International Journal of Human Rights, 17:4.
Tynes, R. and Early, B.R., 2015. Governments, rebels, and the use of child soldiers in internal armed conflicts: A global analysis, 1987-2007. Peace Economics, Peace Science and Public Policy, 21:1.
UN, 1989. Convention on the rights of the child. United Nations General Assembly.
UNICEF, 2007. Paris principles and commitments on children associated with armed forces or armed groups.
Uppard, S., 2003. Child soldiers and children associated with the fighting forces. Medicine, Conflict and Survival, 19:2.
Zack-Williams, A.B., 2001. Child soldiers in the civil war in Sierra Leone. Review of African Political Economy, 28:87.

Terrorist Groups & Autocracy

You cannot win a war against terrorism as long as people are willing to die for their beliefs.
– Edward Snowden

Fighting terrorism is like being a goalkeeper; you can make a hundred brilliant saves but the only shot that people remember is the one that gets past you.
– Paul Wilkinson

Whether terrorism is in any way connected to a regime type, particularly democracy or autocracy, is a question that has sparked major research in political science, comparative politics and International Relations (IR). The topic is part of a larger, age-old inquiry into the relationship between violence, terror (Box 3.13), and politics. In The Republic, Plato examined, among other themes, which political systems were least vulnerable to stasis (στάσις – civil strife) or civil war. Aristotle, too, noted how tyrants often depended on fear and terror to maintain control over their communities. In this sense, the question as to how particular types of regimes are liable to be subjected to terrorism reveals as much about their modernity as it does about the nature of regime types and violence. As the concept of sovereignty expanded across the globe and as states became ever more centralized, with growing economic and military capacities at their disposal, the means by which to overthrow any given regime were increasingly reduced. Terrorism, as a form of asymmetric warfare, is thus deployed by actors who hold little or no means by which to overthrow a far more capacitated state-led actor. Nevertheless, even the matter of power asymmetries only says so much about the phenomenon of terror since state authorities have also historically deployed terror to achieve certain goals; see also Box 3.13 on terror.

That being said, the relationship between terrorist groups and regime type has often been broached on the basis of whether democracy facilitates or hinders the former. Research tends to be split on how to address that connection, including whether it exists, and other analyses have sought to problematize types of autocracies with a view to disentangling repression and political control from the use of terror. In this regard, the literature points to the nature of the political audience (Box 7.1), the type of regime, and how long it has been in place in order to unpack the different types of relations between terror and autocracy. It is also worth bearing in mind that these studies gained added impetus due to the global 'War on Terror' launched in the early twenty-first century. As al-Qaeda, a militant Islamist group, successfully attacked the United States (US) sovereign territory on 11 September 2001 (9/11), the US government proclaimed a global 'War on Terror.' In doing so, it sought to neutralize al-Qaeda and other groups that used or threatened to use methods as violent as those that had led to the destruction of the Twin Towers in New York City and which had damaged the Pentagon in Washington, DC (Andréani 2004). Were that not enough, democracy, as opposed to autocracy, was also cast by US authorities throughout that period as a potential remedy for terrorism and political violence broadly understood, a claim that came under ample scrutiny (Gause, III 2005).

SEE ALSO This entry is related to the phenomenon of terrorism & regime promotion, and these groups can embrace various ideologies ranging from anarchism and ultra-nationalism to fundamentalist political Islam. These groups often live in symbiosis with transnational crime organizations and may devolve into one once they abandon their political goals. They practice an asymmetric form of warfare different from guerrilla tactics but that may be combined with other forms.

DEFINITION A terrorist group encompasses an organization or network of people whose principal means of political struggle rely on terrorism. It is conceptually distinct from 'lone wolf' terrorism, whose operations are organized by a single individual as opposed to an organized group of actors. Furthermore, terrorism is a specific type of warfare that relies on the use of violence against civilian or non-civilian populations, mainly with the aim of causing fear as well as publicizing that fear across society at large. As a specific type of politically oriented violence, terrorism is usually applied throughout an asymmetric armed conflict, specifically when one group holds far fewer capacities and far less power than the opponent (English 2009; Wilkinson 2011). The aforementioned 11 September 2001 attacks are paradigmatic in that regard, as they were applied by a network of militant individuals against a more powerful adversary. They were also highly visible attacks against symbolic infrastructure in order to scare the adversary as well as to exaggerate al-Qaeda's overall capacities, an achievement for which it garnered international notoriety but also admiration among other militant groups.

In the words of Richard English: "Terrorism involves heterogeneous violence use or threatened with political aim (…) it possesses an important psychological dimension, producing terror or fear among a directly threatened group (…) in the hope of maximizing political communication and achievement (…) it represents a subspecies of warfare, and as such it can form part of a wider campaign of violent and non-violent attempts at political leverage." (English 2009: 24).

All in all, terrorism is less concerned with exhausting an adversary or destroying its combat capabilities – as is the case of guerrilla warfare, another type of asymmetric warfare – than spreading fear with a view to delivering a message (Roberts 2005; English 2009; Wilkinson 2011; Law 2016). Terrorist groups are subsequently those organizations, often sub-state or transnational entities, that apply such methods.

KEY SIGNIFICANCE The relationship between regime type and the potential for violence has remained a relevant research topic now explored in comparative authoritarianism. Some scholars have inquired about the capacities of established democracies to prevent or co-opt terrorist movements by virtue of being more inclusive and of providing alternative modes of political mobilization that need not resort to violence (Crenshaw 1981; Eubank & Weinberg 1994; Gaibulloev et al. 2017; Magen 2018). Others nevertheless indicate that democracies are by far more susceptible to terrorism when compared to autocracies (Eyerman 1998; Eubank & Weinberg 2001; Wilson & Piazza 2013). These findings have increasingly been discussed as scholars have unpacked the meanings and types of autocracies and the extent to which democracies are sufficiently well established or not (Aksoy et al. 2012; Conrad et al. 2014; Gaibulloev et al. 2017).

Some scholars suggest that instead of the regime type per se, it is the system of rule and its audience that shape the susceptibility to terrorism. Should the audience costs be too high, insofar as incumbents are to be held accountable, terrorists are more likely to act in those regimes (Conrad et al. 2014). This would suggest that autocracies whose rulers are increasingly visible and connected to a given audience are as likely as unsettled democracies to be subjected to terrorist attacks (Wilson & Piazza 2013; Magen 2018). In like manner, autocracies whose rulers are dependent on a larger base of support are more likely to suffer coups, even though those changes do not necessarily affect the overall system of autocratic rule (Aksoy et al. 2012).

The impact of terrorism on regime stability is multifaceted and largely depends on the type of regime targeted. While terrorism rarely causes outright regime change, it can destabilize regimes, especially electoral ones, and affect leadership survival. Democracies are generally more resilient to terrorism due to their ability to address grievances peacefully and project strength. They often experience a 'rally-around-the-flag' effect post-attacks, which can increase public support for the government. However, younger democracies are more vulnerable because they may struggle with political instability and projecting confidence in their governance. Dictatorships, on the other hand, are not uniform in their vulnerability to terrorism. Electoral authoritarian regimes, which hold elections without genuine competition, are particularly susceptible to destabilization. Terrorism can signal a leader's incompetence in providing security, leading to elite betrayal or increased repression, both of which can destabilize the regime.

In contrast, closed authoritarian regimes – with tighter control and fewer avenues for dissent – are more resilient. They can suppress opposition more effectively and are less prone to elite defections (Adam & Tsavou 2022; Aksoy et al. 2015; Magen 2018).

ORIGINS Though the use of violent methods for the sake of spreading fear is as old as warfare itself (Schelling 2008), the term was eventually invented throughout the French Revolution in the late eighteenth century (Law 2016). Likewise, as states became increasingly centralized and acquired more policing capacities, such as in the nineteenth-century Russian Empire, terrorism was gradually applied by specific groups for the sake of instilling fear among the governing elites and overthrowing incumbent regimes (e.g., through regicide, see assassination). Similar tactics were applied by some political groups in their struggle against decolonization in the mid-twentieth century, as well as by certain political factions in Europe, to depose or divide fragmented societies (Law 2016).

International law has progressively adapted to criminalize terrorism, addressing both traditional and emerging tactics. Early efforts, such as the 1970 Hague Convention, focused on specific acts like hijacking, reflecting the growing concern over aviation security. As terrorism evolved, so did international legal frameworks. The 1997 Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombings expanded the scope by criminalizing bombings in public places, recognizing the increasing use of explosives in urban settings. This marked a shift towards addressing terrorism as a transnational threat rather than isolated incidents within national borders.

In response to the growing complexity of terrorist networks, the 1999 International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism was pivotal in targeting the financial infrastructure that sustains terrorist activities. This convention required states to criminalize the act of financing terrorism and cooperate in prosecuting or extraditing offenders, reflecting a broader understanding that cutting off funding is essential to countering terrorism effectively.

The events of 11 September 2001 further catalyzed international legal responses. The United Nations Security Council (UNSC) Resolution 1373 (2001) mandated that all member states take concrete steps to prevent terrorism, including denying safe havens to terrorists and enhancing international cooperation in criminal investigations. This resolution underscored the global nature of terrorism and emphasized that no state should harbor individuals involved in terrorist activities.

Indeed, as the 'Global War on Terror' defined US aims, the UNSC passed resolution 1566 of 2004 in an effort to delimit the aims and scope of the practice: "criminal acts, including against civilians, committed with the intent to cause death or serious bodily injury, or taking of hostages, with the purpose to provoke a state of terror in the general public or in a group of persons or particular persons, intimidate a population or compel a government or an international organization to do or to abstain from doing any act, which constitute offenses within the scope of and as defined in the international conventions and protocols relating to terrorism, are under no circumstances justifiable by considerations of a political, philosophical, ideological, racial, ethnic, religious or other similar nature." (UNSC 2004)

Overall, international law has evolved from addressing specific tactics like hijacking and bombings to a more comprehensive framework that includes financial crimes and transnational cooperation. These conventions reflect an ongoing effort to adapt legal tools to the innovative and evolving tactics used by terrorist organizations. A number of organizations, such as the Association of South East Asian Nations (ASEAN) and the Non-Aligned Movement (NAM) issued statements regarding the need to combat terrorism and terrorist groups in particular.

So important became the notion of terrorism that it was one of the constitutive principles of the Shanghai Cooperation Organization (SCO), supported by China. Thus, one of the SCO's main goals is to contain the 'three evils,' one of which is 'terrorism' (Allison 2018).

As terrorist groups acquired visibility throughout the twentieth century and became an even greater policy concern after the 11 September 2001 attacks on US soil, the relationship between regime type and terrorism came under increased scholarly scrutiny. It is also during this period that the spread of democracy, especially across the Middle East, was taken by some in the US government as a means by which to curtail terrorism, a measure that was viewed with skepticism by sundry scholars (Gause III 2005).

METHODOLOGICAL ISSUES The notion of a 'terrorist group,' more so than a terrorist, is potentially difficult to apply in practice despite its apparent clear-cut definition. Since terrorism is mainly a practice or action, particularly a sub-category of warfare, it is more of a predicate than a substantive, which is to say it characterizes the actions of a group or individual instead of the group or individual itself. To that effect, groups or individuals who have applied terrorist methods at one point or another may also have deployed other tactics, such as guerrilla warfare and political negotiation, throughout their political struggle. This would suggest that, in some situations, the notion of a terrorist group potentially exaggerates the use of those methods over others. As a result, the term 'terrorist group' is also a pejorative means by which to depict any type of armed struggle by specific groups against governing authorities. For all those reasons, the notion of a terrorist group, albeit regularly deployed by several state authorities, may be difficult to objectify. This is not to say, however, that there have not been some groups whose main – if not exclusive – means of fighting were based on terrorism. Al-Qaeda traditionally fits that definition, whereas other militant groups, such as ISIL, for instance, have deployed a mix of methods against their enemies.

In any case, since the distinction between different types of violence is often difficult to pin down, not least among sub-state actors who tend to defy the powers of the state, the notions of both terrorism and terrorist groups have frequently been appropriated by incumbent political elites to label and justify repression. Moreover, states too have sponsored terrorist groups, although that level of support has decreased substantially over the early twentieth century (Collins 2014). Partly because of great power pressure but also because of socioeconomic changes, contemporary terrorist groups are potentially less dependent on state support. Modern communications methods, independent financial support and relaxed border controls have allowed terrorist groups to become increasingly autonomous (Collins 2014). Be that as it may, the label 'terrorist group' warrants caution. Opposition groups in various illiberal regimes have sometimes been labeled terrorists – or have witnessed attacks being misleadingly attributed to them – in the effort to demonize or violently repress potential challengers (Horsman 2005; Aksoy et al. 2012; Lemon 2018; Edward 2019). Labeling groups as terrorists – as opposed to combatants – may also provide states or specific political authorities with ways in which to curtail their rights in such a way as to avoid international humanitarian law, specifically the Geneva Conventions. It is thus important to problematize the label, reflexively admitting its potential shortfalls, before applying it as an objective category for research.

As concerns the relationship between autocracy and terrorism, a variety of methodological issues need to be considered in order to detect relevant findings. A major issue has to do with the time frame of the analysis. Although some research has pointed to a positive relationship between democracy and terrorist group activity, it is worth bearing in mind that the historical context plays a role in substantiating that relationship. Some of the most noteworthy terrorist attacks after the middle of the twentieth century took place in European democracies precisely because they were aimed at overthrowing liberal and market-oriented regimes in those states (Magen 2018), as shown in terrorism & regime promotion.

Likewise, research has to bear in mind the variety of democracies, their degree of establishment, and whether they are polyarchic, liberal or direct in order to account for the likelihood of terrorist action. The same argument goes for studying the connection between terrorist groups and autocracy, as recent scholarship has increasingly unpacked the number and types of autocracies in order to detect distinct relations between terrorism and regime type (Piazza 2013; Wilson & Piazza 2013; Conradet al. 2014).

IMPACT ON POLICY The notion of terrorism, and terrorist groups in particular, has had a tremendous impact on policy. Most supranational organizations have routinely condemned particular groups as terrorist, and several states, such as those in the UNSC, have issued lists of groups deemed to be terrorist. By being labeled terrorist, those groups face the prospect of having their existence forbidden in certain states and, in some cases, being subject to sanctions and lawful killing (Scheipers 2015; Walzer 2015). Were that not enough, political elites have often propounded the existence of a relationship between regime type and democracy as a way of resisting current and future violence (Gause III 2005).

How to cite:

Teles Fazendeiro, Bernardo, 2025. Terrorist Groups and Autocracy. Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Adam, A. and Tsavou, E., 2022. One Strike and You're out… Dictators' Fate in the Aftermath of Terrorism. Defence and Peace Economics, 33:5.

Aksoy, D., Carter, D.B. and Wright, J., 2012. Terrorism in Dictatorships. The Journal of Politics, 74:3.

Andréani, G., 2004. The "War on terror:" Good cause, wrong concept.' Survival, 46:4.

Collins, S.D., 2014. State-Sponsored Terrorism: In Decline, Yet Still a Potent Threat. Politics & Policy, 42:1.

Conrad, C., Conrad, J. and Young, J., 2014. Tyrants and terrorism: Why some autocrats are terrorized while others are not. International Studies Quarterly, 58:3.

Crenshaw, M., 1981. The causes of terrorism. Comparative Politics, 13:4.

English, R., 2009. Terrorism How to Respond. Oxford University Press.

Eubank, W.L. and Weinberg, L., 1994. Does democracy encourage terrorism? Terrorism and Political Violence, 6:4.

Eubank, W.L. and Weinberg, L., 2001. Terrorism and democracy: Perpetrators and victims. Terrorism and political violence, 13:1.

Eyerman, J., 1998. Terrorism and Democratic States: Soft Targets or Accessible Systems. International Interactions, 24:2.

Gaibulloev, K., Piazza, J. and Sandler, T., 2017. Regime types and terrorism. International organization, 71:3.

Gause III, G., 2005. Can democracy stop terrorism? Foreign Affairs.

Law, R., 2016. Terrorism: A History. Polity.

Magen, A., 2018. Fighting Terrorism: The Democracy Advantage. Journal of Democracy, 29:1.

Piazza, J., 2013. Regime Age and Terrorism: Are New Democracies Prone to Terrorism? International Interactions, 39:2.

Roberts, A., 2005. The "War on Terror" in historical perspective. Survival, 47:2.

United Nations Security Council (UNSC), 2001. Res 1373 (28 September 2001) UN Doc S/RES/1373.

United Nations Security Council (UNSC), 2004. Res 1566 (8 October 2004) UN Doc S/RES/1566.

Wilkinson, P., 2011. Terrorism versus Democracy. Routledge.

Wilson, M. and Piazza, J., 2013. Autocracies and Terrorism: Conditioning Effects of Authoritarian Regime Type on Terrorist Attacks. American Journal of Political Science, 57:4.

Uncivil Society

Force, violence, pressure, or compulsion with a view to conformity, are both uncivilized and undemocratic
– Mahatma Gandhi

The concept of 'uncivil society' is a complex and debated topic within academic and political discourse, often seen as a counterpart to civil society that challenges traditional notions of civic engagement and democratic values. While some scholars argue for its clear definition, others highlight its inherent complexity and that it is context-dependent, suggesting that attempts to narrowly define it may oversimplify the diverse manifestations of non-state actors. The term encompasses a range of disruptive and unwelcome elements that emerge in the spaces between individuals and the state, including radicalism, extremism, and ideologies that threaten social cohesion and democratic principles.

This debate reflects broader discussions about the role of civil society in democratic governance, questioning whether all forms of civic engagement align with liberal democratic values. Critics also point out that the concept may be rooted in Western perspectives, potentially overlooking the diversity of non-state actors globally. The study of uncivil society invites a critical examination of how certain non-state actors may undermine or challenge democratic ideals, emphasizing the need for a nuanced understanding that recognizes both cooperative and contentious elements within civil society.

SEE ALSO This perspective exposes the non-democratic nature of civil society and the historical roots of societal (self-)organization that trace back long before the advent of democracy as a regime type. While the concept is not accepted unanimously, it does move beyond the Western democracy bias in the assessment of political systems.

DEFINITION The term uncivil society is a controversial and debated concept within academic and political discourse. It is often used interchangeably with 'uncivil civil society,' which refers to the non-state dimension characterized by negative and disruptive elements. It is a surprisingly under-theorized concept. The controversy surrounding this concept primarily revolves around whether it should be clearly defined or whether its ambiguity is more reflective of its nature. Whereas some scholars sustain that it should be discontinued, as there is a conceptual proliferation with very little analytic value (Bob 2011), others are remarkably hesitant to give a detailed definition. They contend that the concept is inherently complex and context-dependent, and attempts to define it too narrowly may oversimplify the diverse manifestations of non-state actors. From this perspective, the reluctance to provide a clear definition stems from an acknowledgment of the fluid and subjective nature of the term.

In the first group, Rumford's definition characterizes uncivil society as an inclusive term encompassing various disruptive, unwelcome, and threatening elements that emerge in the spaces between the individual and the state. Using uncivil society as a catch-all category may hinder common understanding, especially when trying to explain complex phenomena such as the motivation behind significant events like the 9/11 attacks (Rumford 2001). On the other hand, Kopecky and Mudde (2003), while using the term in their edited book, argue against the distinction between the civil and the uncivil. Their perspective challenges the binary categorization of society into civil and uncivil realms, suggesting that such a distinction is unhelpful. They argue for a more nuanced understanding that acknowledges the complexity and diversity of actors and movements that fall outside traditional notions of a 'civil' society.

The connection between the concept of 'uncivil society' and radicalism or extremism, both political and religious, introduces another layer of complexity to the ongoing debates in political science and sociology. Nationalist groups, as mentioned by Kaldor & Muro (2023), may exhibit characteristics that range from non-violent to violent, exclusivist, and fundamentalist. This suggests that within the spectrum of uncivil society, there are variations in the intensity of disruptive or threatening behaviors. Nationalist groups, when driven to violence and exclusivism, can pose significant challenges to societal harmony and stability. Similarly, politically extremist groups, such as extreme right-wing parties, may not necessarily engage in violent activities, but they can still be considered part of uncivil society due to their adherence to ideological concerns. These concerns may include nationalism, racism, anti-democracy, xenophobia, and a belief in the necessity of a strong state. The ideological nature of these concerns underscores the notion that uncivil society is not solely defined by physical violence but also by the potential for ideas and beliefs to disrupt social cohesion and challenge democratic principles (Pedahzur & Weinberg 2001).

KEY SIGNIFICANCE The debate around uncivil society highlights broader discussions within the study of civil society, non-state actors, and social movements. It raises questions about how various forms of civic engagement, dissent, or resistance that may not conform to traditional notions of a civil society are categorized and analyzed. In the academic literature and the general use, the term 'uncivil society' to describe manifestations of civil society that challenge liberal democratic values reflects the recognition that not all non-state actors or civic movements inherently align with principles of openness, inclusivity, and democratic governance. Violence is often singled out as a characteristic of uncivil society, but the concept extends beyond physical violence to encompass other disruptive elements. This may include extremist, exclusivist or dogmatic ideologies, predatory practices, and general rule-breaking. This broader understanding of uncivil society aligns with the ongoing discussions about the role of civil society in democratic governance. It highlights the need for societies to critically examine the motivation, goals, and methods of various non-state actors, recognizing that not all manifestations of civil society necessarily contribute to the advancement of liberal democratic values.

Critics argue that the concept of uncivil society may be rooted in Western perspectives and might not adequately capture the diversity of non-state actors and movements globally. The values and norms associated with civility and incivility may vary across different cultures, making it essential to question whether the concept is universally applicable or if it reflects a particular (Western) worldview.

Scholars also engage in discussions about the relationship between uncivil society and democracy. Some critiques challenge the notion put forth by scholars like Robert Putnam, who highlighted a mutually beneficial relationship between civil society and democracy. Skeptics argue that not all manifestations of civil society contribute positively to democratic ideals, and, in fact, some may undermine democratic values.

While less crystallized in the literature, there are reflections on the 'uncivil' aspect of civil society in relation to capitalism. This perspective explores how certain elements within civil society may challenge or exploit aspects of capitalism. This could involve critiquing the impact of certain economic practices on social inequality, labor rights, or environmental sustainability.

Another relevant factor to be considered is violence and the legitimization of the use of force. Non-state armed groups, even those with popular support in specific conflicts or self-determination causes, can be perceived as troublesome due to their potential to disrupt stability and challenge state authority.

ORIGIN To understand the origin of the concept, studies on the differences between civil and civility should be stressed. Enlightenment thinkers, such as John Locke, Jean-Jacques Rousseau, and Montesquieu, often explored the nature of human society and the development of civilization as a process of moving away from a hypothetical state of nature, which was portrayed as a condition of primitive violence and disorder. Through the establishment of civil societies, humans could create a more organized and harmonious social order. Rousseau and Locke proposed the idea of a social contract, where individuals willingly give up some of their freedoms in exchange for the benefits of an organized society. This contract was seen to escape the chaos and conflict of the state of nature. A community is civilized if laws and institutions govern it. This was contrasted with what was considered more primitive or despotic societies where rule was arbitrary and based on force rather than reason. Scholars have critically argued how external actions, specifically war, often accompany the internal process of civilization and, in the case of European societies, external aggression (Keane 1998; Kaldor & Muro 2003: 151). Particularly from Napoleonic times onwards, colonialism was justified by the idea of 'civilizing' the native populations. It was also a moral justification for imperialism, even though the methods employed in the process of subjugation were seldom civil in their treatment of the colonized populations.

The term 'uncivil society' appears to have emerged in the political lexicon as a response or counterpart to the enthusiastic acclaim of civil society that was associated with the democratic revolutions in Latin America and Eastern Europe during the 1990s. The concept gained significant attention during the 1990s in the context of the collapse of communist regimes in Eastern Europe and the struggles for democratization in Latin America. The introduction of the term uncivil society suggests a critical perspective or a recognition of challenges and complexities within the societal fabric that the term civil society might have idealized. It could imply a focus on aspects of social life that are disruptive, contentious, or deviate from the norms of civility and cooperation associated with the concept of civil society. Its usage and significance may reflect a growing awareness of social tensions, conflicts, or discontents that were not fully captured by the optimistic narratives surrounding the concept of civil society during the 1990s democratic revolutions (Stewart 1997).

LITERATURE The main academic debate surrounding the concept of uncivil society revolves around its inclusion or exclusion from the definition of civil society. This debate is not so much concerned with historical problems associated with the term or its application to society as a whole but rather with how it should be positioned in relation to the broader concept of civil society. The argument seems to hinge on whether uncivil society should be considered a part of, or distinct from, the traditional understanding of civil society. The inclusion vs. exclusion argument has dominated the first debates. At the core is the definition of 'civil society' itself, and, in particular, the question arises as to whether elements traditionally considered part of civil society – such as advocacy groups, NGOs, and community organizations – may exhibit behaviors or characteristics deemed 'uncivil' should still be classified under the umbrella of civil society. Advocates for inclusion might argue that civil society is diverse, encompassing both cooperative and contentious elements, while those favoring exclusion might emphasize a more normative understanding of civil society as a space characterized by cooperation, dialogue, and civic virtue (Shils 1992; Whitehead 1997; Kopecky & Mudde 2003).

Among the inclusivists, Bob (2011) argues that the different meanings of uncivil society are related to the three primary ways in which civil society is defined: associational life, the good society and the public sphere.

More recent literature has investigated uncivil society as a transnational phenomenon linked to globalization. Two main perspectives can be highlighted. According to the first one, uncivil society is connected to globalization through the proliferation and influence of NGOs as part of a neoliberal consensus aimed at reducing the role of the state. This also reflects a critique of the neoliberal approach and its impact on the role of the state (Stewart 1997).

The second perspective, introduced after the events of 9/11, employs the term uncivil society to denote reactions to neoliberal globalization that are considered 'illiberal.' The example provided is the al-Qaeda network, which is seen as an expression of an 'uncivil' reaction to the globalized world order. The term is used here to characterize responses that deviate from the ideals of liberal democracy and market-driven globalization. However, the passage notes that there has been limited in-depth analysis of this usage.

In both cases, uncivil society is associated with phenomena that transcend national boundaries, suggesting that the term is applied to describe elements of societal organization, activism, or reaction that extend beyond traditional borders. The global context, particularly the dynamics of globalization and its impact on political, economic, and social structures, seems to be a key factor in these discussions (Rumford 2001; Kaldor & Muro 2003).

CLASSIFICATIONS & EXAMPLES Among the various negative attributes that are associated with uncivil society, the most common is violence. The post-Cold War era has seen a shift in the perception of global threats in Western contexts, with insurgencies, violent terrorist networks, and criminal organizations often identified as some of the most significant challenges. Terrorist groups have been defined not only by their ideological or political identities but also by their use of violence as a primary means of achieving their objectives. The emphasis is often on nonstate actors employing asymmetric tactics to instill fear and disrupt societal stability. The aim is to create widespread fear, gain attention for their cause, or influence political decision-making through violence. While not all terrorist groups are motivated by religious ideologies, there has been an increase in the prominence of religious extremism as a driving force.

Organized crime is commonly associated with engaging in illegal activities for financial gain. Unlike political or ideological motives, organized crime groups are primarily driven by the accumulation of money or valuable resources. Their activities often undermine legal economic systems and contribute to corruption. While profit is the primary goal, criminal groups may use violence and coercion to protect their interests, eliminate rivals, or maintain control over territories (Irrera 2023).

However, several scholars argue that there are additional elements beyond violence that can contribute to the characterization of a group or movement as potentially uncivil. Kaldor and Muro (2003) mention extremism, particularly of an ethnic or religious nature, and fundamentalism. Beyond physical violence, an uncivil society may exhibit intolerance toward diverse perspectives, beliefs, or identities. Exclusivity and the refusal to engage in constructive dialogue with differing opinions can contribute to an uncivil atmosphere.

A disregard for the rule of law and a tendency to operate outside established legal frameworks is a second one and may include actions such as vigilantism, extrajudicial measures, or defiance of legal institutions (Whitehead 1997). Other scholars also refer to those actions or ideologies that contribute to the erosion of social cohesion, community bonds, and trust, producing divisions along ethnic, religious, or socioeconomic lines and to the tendency to embrace authoritarian structures and practices that may result in the suppression of dissent and a lack of respect for individual rights (Kopecky & Mudde 2003; Fatton 1995).

IMPACT ON POLICY Investigations on the implications that uncivil society may have on policy necessarily deal with the consolidated idea that strengthening civil society contributes to democratization. According to this, a vibrant and active civil society is often seen as a crucial component of a democratic system. Civil society organizations can act as intermediaries between citizens and the state, providing a channel for citizen participation, advocacy, and the protection of rights. As a consequence, an uncivil society characterized by intolerance, violence, and disregard for democratic principles can undermine the foundations of a democratic system. It may contribute to a climate of fear, suppression of dissent, and erosion of democratic norms and values. If certain groups within society are excluded or marginalized by an uncivil society, it can result in heightened social polarization. This polarization can hinder inclusive political processes and contribute to the fragmentation of democratic societies.

Therefore, providing support for NGOs, advocacy groups, and community organizations should enhance their capacity to hold governments accountable, advocate for citizens' rights, and contribute to the development of democratic norms. Additionally, policies that encourage constructive discourse and collaboration can contribute to a more democratic and stable society.

However, not everyone agrees on these – apparently unattainable – assumptions. For example, Berman (1997) highlights a nuanced perspective on civil society, suggesting that the vibrancy of civil society alone may not guarantee a positive or 'civil' outcome. In the case he presents – Germans living in the Weimar Republic – he contends that a highly active civil society, characterized by dense associational networks, did not prevent the rise of Nazism. Instead, these networks were infiltrated and captured by Nazi organizers, contributing to the Nazis' seizure of power (Berman 1997).

Some religious or nationalist movements may emerge from a democratic base and garner support from the general population through democratic processes, but they do not necessarily uphold values that align with liberal principles, such as individual rights, pluralism, and a strong emphasis on personal freedoms. Segments of civil society that embrace liberal, 'Western' values may not always have a strong democratic legitimacy in the form of a grassroots base (Abdel Rahman 2002).

Finally, Avritzer (1997) observes that civil society can only be as civil as the circumstances allow. The emergence of uncivil society is more likely when the state is weak (cf. state fragility & failure). A weak state may struggle to provide essential services, maintain law and order, or guarantee the physical and material security of its citizens. Referring, in particular to Latin American countries like Colombia or Peru, Avritzer's framework suggests that uncivil society reflects the challenges faced by societies in certain contexts where traditional structures and institutions may be inadequate or dysfunctional and that under such conditions, civil society may take on characteristics that deviate from the normative expectations of a vibrant and engaged civic sphere (Avritzer 1997).

NEW FRONTIERS Although uncivil society remains a concept that is extremely difficult to define, measure and investigate, potential new research trends have already emerged and may develop.

The transnational dimension in which many uncivil groups move and interact deserves greater attention. For example, Pedahzur and Weinberg (2001) discuss the 'internationalism' of extreme right-wing groups, stressing their presence in multiple countries and regions around the world. They may share common ideologies, symbols, and narratives that serve as unifying factors, but advances in communication and transportation technologies have facilitated the exchange of ideas, strategies, and even individuals among these groups, contributing to their global reach.

Religious and nationalist militants use the same advances to boost the transnational character of their actions. The insecurities generated by globalization play a significant role in the growth of these movements. The capture of state power is frequently cited as a strategy by these movements to achieve their goals. Once in power, they may implement policies aimed at reducing reliance on global institutions, restricting immigration, and promoting nationalist or ethnocentric agendas. The desire for religious or ethnic self-rule reflects a response to perceived threats to identity and autonomy in the face of globalization (Kaldor & Munro 2003).

Lastly, the outsourcing of military and security functions to private actors, such as Private Military Companies (PMCs), introduces a novel dimension. These companies operate outside traditional state military structures, and their involvement can have implications for state authority, democratic governance, and civil-military relations. The privatization of military functions may raise concerns about accountability, transparency, and adherence to human rights standards. The presence of private military actors challenges state authorities, potentially weakening the state's monopoly on the use of force. This erosion of state authority can have implications for democratic governance, as the traditional mechanisms for oversight and accountability may be less effective when military functions are outsourced to private entities. This can contribute to the consolidation of power in the hands of authoritarian leaders or regimes. Private actors may operate with less transparency and scrutiny, providing opportunities for authoritarian leaders to wield influence without the same checks and balances that apply to state-controlled military forces. This dynamic introduces new dimensions of incivility as it challenges established norms and practices in the management of force.

How to cite:

Irrera, Daniela, 2025. Uncivil Society, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Abdel Rahman, M., 2002. The politics of ''uncivil'' society in Egypt. Review of African Political Economy, 91.

Avritzer, L., 2004. Civil society in Latin America: Uncivil, liberal and participatory models. In Exploring civil society: Political and cultural contexts, Glasius, M., Lewis, D., and Seckinelgin, H., eds., Routledge.

Bob, C., 2011. Civil and Uncivil Society. In Oxford Handbook of Civil Society, Edwards, M.D., ed., Oxford University Press.

Glasius, M., 2010. Uncivil society. In International Encyclopedia of Civil Society, Anheier, H., Kaldor, M. and Glasius, M., eds., Springer.

Kaldor, M., and Munro, D., 2003. Religious and nationalist militant groups. In Global Civil Society 2003, Kaldor, M., Anheier, H., and Glasius, M., eds., Oxford University Press.

Keane, J., 1998. Civil society: Old images, new visions. Polity.

Kopecky, P., and Mudde, C., eds., 2003. Uncivil society? Contentious politics in post-communist Europe. Routledge.

Irrera, D., 2023. Criminality and Delinquency: The Impact on Regional and Global Security. In Routledge Handbook of the Future of Warfare, Gruszczak, A. and Kaempf, S., eds., Routledge.

Leander, A., 2022. Militarization matters: rhetorical resonances and market militarism. Critical Military Studies.

Pedahzur, A. and Weinberg, L., 2001. Modern European democracy and its enemies: The threat of the extreme right. Totalitarian Movements and Political Religions, 2:2.

Rumford, C., 2001. Confronting "uncivil society" and the "dark side of globalization."

Shils, E., 1992. Civility and civil society. In Civility and citizenship in liberal democratic societies, Banfield, E.C., ed., Paragon House.

Stewart, S., 1997. Happy ever after in the marketplace: Non-government organizations and uncivil society. Review of African Political Economy, 24:71.

Whitehead, L., 1997. Bowling in the Bronx: The uncivil interstices between civil and political society. Democratization, 4:1.

Warlords

In the midst of chaos, there is also opportunity – Sun Tzu (孙子 – Sūnzǐ, 771-256 BCE), Chinese Strategist and Philosopher

War does not determine who is right – only who is left – Attributed to Bertrand Russell, British philosopher

Warlords are leaders of armed groups that control local territory using force and patronage (Marten 2013). They have some military legitimacy but not political legitimacy (Giustozzi 2005). The phenomenon of warlords is a complex and multifaceted issue that arises in contexts where state authority is weak or has collapsed entirely (cf. state fragility & failure). Warlords are typically non-state actors who command armed groups, exerting control over territories through the use of force and intimidation.

Rebel regimes and warlords differ significantly in their motivations and structures. Rebel regimes are foremost politically motivated, seeking to replace or reform existing state structures, and they typically emerge from organized groups that have succeeded in civil conflicts. These regimes aim to establish governance and often engage in power-sharing to maintain stability. In contrast, warlords are primarily driven by self-enrichment rather than political ideology. Rebel regimes can become warlords if they abandon their political goes (and vice versa, as shown in the entry rebel regimes).

Warlords thrive in environments of chaos and insecurity, often emerging in post-conflict zones or regions where authoritarian regimes have fallen apart. As a phenomenon, this topic intersects security studies, peace and conflict studies and comparative authoritarianism. Understanding the dynamics of warlordism is crucial for addressing the broader implications on governance, security, and international relations in affected regions.

SEE ALSO Warlords historically overlapped with 'Big Men' when they possessed traces of tribal authority and were more synonymous with rebel regimes. They are sometimes called 'boss,' but the concepts of 'bossism' are different; Caudillo comes closer but is distinct, as shown in Box 1.10. Mercenaries are a different concept altogether, even though warlords can be bought too.

DEFINITION Warlords are non-state political-military actors who lead armed groups that control local territory while keeping a weak central authority at bay (Giustozzi 2005). They are motivated by greed and aim to acquire territory, money and resources through the use and threat of violence (Duffield 1998). They almost exclusively emerge in weak authoritarian regimes, which have seen their security institutions collapse and fall apart. Scholars have argued that when the state's power is fragmented, localized power may emerge (Hills 1997: 35; Freeman 2015). Sometimes, they originate from the military, with a faction leader defecting and setting up an alternative power base (Freeman 2015). The warlord often has some form of professional or paramilitary experience, but their militia is usually not very well trained or disciplined.

After the security institutions have fallen apart, warlords maximize their profits from state disorder and have an interest in sustaining state collapse. Compared to the states where they operate, warlords are very powerful. The state needs the warlord's compliance more than the warlord needs the state. Warlords also emerge in post-conflict zones, where power, law and civil order have disappeared (Hills 1997: 35; Freeman 2015).

Max Weber noted that warlords are permanent figures in a chronic state of conflict. He argued that the 'rulership' of warlords rests upon 'strictly personal charisma,' which is demonstrated through their successes in war. (Joose & Willey 2020) The warlord focuses on taking land that is outside of government control, such as unmonitored trade routes and mines.

Warlords appear to provide security, but they also manufacture insecurity to justify their existence. Warlords and their militias need insecurity in order to flourish. Those living in war zones fear constant attacks from armed looters. As physical security decreases and society breaks down, individuals need local protection in order to survive. This makes them more dependent on local warlords (Hills 1997). Thus, physical force is what provides limited stability instead of moral or legitimate authority.

Warlords prey on the population and recruit from the local community (MacKinlay 2000: 56). The warlord does not depend on any popular support and the only service he provides, if any, is security. Waging military campaigns may be necessary to maintain some legitimacy, but overall, they are not committed to a higher cause. They often target the population rather than protect it from harm.

Warlords do not have political motivations, though they sometimes may pretend to. Their main motivation is self-enrichment, not state-building or any sort of collective interest. Jean-Germain Gros writes that they have the "emotional immaturity of teenage fighters." (Gros 1996: 459). Other scholars concur that warlords are one-dimensional and mostly engage in indiscriminate violence against the population under their control (Lezhnev 2005). They are devoid of any ideology, and unlike leaders of insurgencies, they do not have to reinforce some sort of ideology constantly. In some incidents, Roger MacGinty (2010) notes, warlords exploit a shared identity of geography, tribe, clan, ethnicity or religion with their constituency.

Warlords may also pretend to helm some sort of political organization, such as Charles Taylor in Liberia, Joseph Kony in Uganda and Foday Sankoh in Sierra Leone. They only aim to control territory and defy the state. The militia that works under their command may not operate under the assumption that they are fighting on behalf of a political movement, however. Nearly all warlords in Somalia, the Democratic Republic of Congo, the Republic of Congo and Liberia held high office at one point in time prior to emerging as warlords. In Somalia, Mohamed Aidid acted as defense minister (1979-1991) for Somali president Siad Barre. By holding this position, Aidid was able to acquire arms clandestinely prior to the civil war. Charles Taylor was able to do the same when he ran the state procurement agency under President Samuel Doe (1980-1990).

Warlords usually do not provide any sort of public good or service, and if they do, the recipients are carefully chosen. The most they usually offer as a public good are distributions of cash, gifts and arms to their supporters. Any goods that the warlord provides only cement their clientelistic networks (Giustozzi 2004). Their legitimacy is rooted in this charisma and patronage ties. They offer privatized security and exploit unregulated markets but have none of the burdens of the state.

Warlords operate at the top, exercising hierarchical and authoritarian forms of leadership. They have some trusted subordinates but generally do not rely on any formal structure. The rank structures within warlord armies are ambiguous (Thomas et al. 2005). For this reason, warlord systems do not survive the death or decline in power of the warlord. The entire system is based on one person, which leaves favored individuals in the lurch. The warlord's power relies on force, charisma and patronage, similar to personalist rule in dictatorships.

Because they have no political agenda, they do not have a politically sensitive path to navigate or need to adhere to an ideology. They do not need to persuade a constituency since threats of violence are enough to ensure compliance. They prey on civilians rather than attempt to represent them.

Warlords want to profit from state disorder, and their power is often dependent on their ability to govern the war economy (Le Billon 2001; 2021). They fund themselves through different forms of looting and predation. They can tax diamond diggers, miners, drug producers, traffickers and smugglers (cf. resource curse). When government is absent, they can tax goods in transit and set up checkpoints (Hill 1997). In some cases, warlords have even managed to engage in the logging, mining and oil trade. They sell local resources on the international market and trade with foreign firms, which brings in hard currency that they can use to buy more weapons or enrich themselves. Warlords also earn revenues by providing protection and manipulating scarcity. They can also make money by intercepting foreign aid and stealing from the local population. Their economic objectives drive them to avoid acquiring any kind of fixed economic asset. They rarely ever invest in the territory under their control because it entails great risk to their power. In general, warlords do not care if the territory that they control deteriorates.

Foreign states may opportunistically offer support for warlords. Border states can use warlords to challenge the domestic sovereignty of weak neighbors (Marten 2013). States bordering Afghanistan supported local warlords, such as Iran, Uzbekistan, Tajikistan and Pakistan.

In rare cases, warlords are able to take control over not only large territories in the countries where they originate from but also neighboring weak countries as well. Charles Taylor was able to take control of the frontier zones of Guinea and the Ivory Coast, referred to as 'Taylorland,' and do what he saw fit. This was even with the complicity of the Ivorian army. Taylorland had currency, a banking system, TV and radio stations, an international airfield and a deep-water port (Reno 1997).

KEY SIGNIFICANCE Warlord systems emerge when the state is under stress and is on the verge of collapse, or at least pockets of territory are not under the state's control. Warlords serve as an example of how power is structured and how territory is controlled in the absence of effective security institutions and a democratic state. Power becomes diffused when the state collapses and later gets exerted through informal and incoherent means by local non-state actors and their groups (Ponzio 2011). Consult Malejacq (2016) for a typology on warlord vs. state power distribution.

Warlords almost always emerge in post-authoritarian settings or the aftermath of an authoritarian regime's collapse. Warlords are not a subset of authoritarian regimes, but they operate in an authoritarian manner. While the authoritarian regime uses the state to control the population and to ensure total security and control over its citizens, a warlord rules with an iron fist but in an environment of total insecurity. In many cases, the warlords are both a cause and a consequence of the insecurity.

ORIGIN Warlords are said to have originated centuries ago. Warlords were first recorded retaining power after the collapse of the Han dynasty in China in the third century and again with the collapse of the Tang dynasty in the tenth century (Roberts 1989). Warlords were also influential in Europe's Thirty Years' War (1618-1648), where they set up personal fiefdoms using force. More scholarship has focused on the role of warlords in early twentieth-century China, with the most notable period being from 1916-1928. This destructive period in Chinese history was in the aftermath of the collapse of the imperial system, as warlords emerged jockeying for power (Charlton & May 1989). Even though the classical era of warlordism in China ended in 1928, some warlords persisted and continued to survive.

There is some controversy over the use of the term 'warlord.' Past president of the Republic of China (Taiwan), Chiang Kai-shek (1887-1975), noted that the essential features of warlords were a lack of political principles, being able to occupy an area, an insatiable need for money and property, and love of his own skin (Charlton & May 1989). Some authors claim that the term is too pejorative and, in many instances, should be called a regional militarist (Wilbur 1968) or provincial militarist (Kapp 1973). In Chinese history, the term (軍閥 – jūnfá) is more benign – and designated to a man who was a lord and was able to wage war. The warlord was someone who could control a region with his military, and there was no higher authority than himself (Sheridan 1966).

In Europe, before the nation-states emerged there were autonomous regions that were governed by local rulers that had many different labels. Some may have referred to these local rulers as barons, dukes and/or warlords (Jackson 2003). Other authors claim that the term warlord should have been limited to characterize the leaders who emerged after the collapse of the Qing Dynasty (Mackinlay 2000; Sheridan 1983).

In English, the word 'warlord' obviously originated from the combination of 'war' and 'lord,' and its first recorded use dates back to 1856, to a critical essay by the American philosopher and poet Ralph Waldo Emerson discussing the aristocracy in England. "Piracy and war gave place to trade, politics and letters, the war-lord to the law-lord; the law-lord to the merchant and the mill-owner, but the privilege was kept, whilst the means of obtaining it were changed." (Emerson 1902: 98).

LITERATURE The literature on warlords has mostly looked at the reasons why they emerge, how they exercise power and what their impact is on the state, conflict resolution and democracy.

Warlords vary considerably in terms of how much power they hold. Warlords do not hold power in an institutionalized sense. Their position of power over society is de facto and directly tied to their possession of military force used to terrorize and coerce society. Although warlords can control territory and may establish primitive forms of local government, they are not a legitimate governing authority for society. Warlordism also differs from neo-patrimonialism and clientelism because they do not need to reward political loyalty through development projects, posts and privileges. They obtain loyalty from their subjects mostly by using or threatening to use force. This means that warlords do not even partly reinvest their revenues in the territory under their control.

As for the military force that they control, the warlord is only able to hold it together due to his own charismatic rule and ability to distribute patronage or promises of some future reward. Rather than being connected by a commitment to a political ideology or structure, individuals are drawn into the militia for transactional reasons. Troops can switch sides frequently depending on where the flow of patronage is coming from (Waldorf 2017).

Warlords are a sign of de-institutionalization and organizational decay of the government because they often rise in authoritarian settings when there has been a protracted civil war and when the state does not have a monopoly over the legitimate use of force. The end of the Cold War saw the rise of warlords again, as there was less aid coming from the two superpowers to prevent the collapse of states, especially in Africa.

Warlords capitalize on opportunities to assert power and influence but usually do not coordinate with one another. They mostly fight against other warlords and other violent non-state actors scrapping to control territory.

The literature mostly concurs that the chances of stability in post-conflict zones decrease when warlords emerge. Most warlords have an interest in maintaining state collapse and insecurity and care little about saving the infrastructure of the state since they will never control it. The warlord usually prefers to defy the centralized state rather than support it.

These groups also present a significant obstacle to the reconstruction of society. Warlord systems, in many cases, fostered the emergence of a 'Kalashnikov culture,' where political disputes are settled through the use of arms. This culture has been especially notable in the Pakistan and Afghanistan border areas, where citizens have gained access to automatic weapons and have ceased to use legal, institutional mechanisms to resolve disputes.

States with warlord-controlled areas are negatively affected by their operations economically as well. Warlords stunt economic growth. They disrupt free trade and make any sort of commerce and investment unpredictable and risky. They make economic transactions more inefficient, expensive and insecure. This leads to capital flight and low levels of other forms of investment. Because of the constant state of insecurity, people must focus on short-term profits while they can. The future can change rapidly with warlords, which makes it difficult to make long-term deals. To illustrate, in Tajikistan in November 1992, in the first phase of the civil war, the town of Kolkhozobod, the center of cotton production, changed hands six times due to infighting among warlord militias.

Warlords generate revenues in a parasitic manner. They extort and tax and create the need for protection (Thomas et al. 2005). They tap into the resources of the state and its people and siphon off what they want. In the case of Somalia where warlord rule has become the norm (see also 'piracy' in Box 7.8), very little investment has taken place. Business contracts could only be enforced through informal protection pacts, and business owners had to rely on warlord militias. Small business owners could not afford the costs of security which priced them out of the market.

Warlords not only cause irreparable damage to security, the economy and the state, but also to prospects for democracy. Warlords have no democratic mandate and usually have no interest in democracy. They also do not adhere to international and human rights laws (Robinson 2001). It was the frustration and disgust with warlords in Afghanistan that led to the emergence of the Taliban in the mid to late 1990s.

Some scholars, however, counter that warlords can play a positive role in democracy and state-building (Bermeo 2003; Giustozzi 2003). Warlords might eventually become a stationary bandit (Giustozzi 2003). In the case of Afghanistan, some influential warlords were incorporated into the state, and some of them became more responsible political actors. In cases where credible commitments can be made to the warlord, they may be willing to disarm their forces (Mukhopadhyay 2009). Nevertheless, the incorporation of warlords in Afghanistan's democracy proved not to be enough. By 2021, the state had collapsed once again, and the Taliban had taken over.

Warlords also negatively affect peace processes. On the one hand, they do not have the power to make peace. On the other hand, they routinely disrupt and destroy peace. They have no interest in a settlement because it would diminish their power (Hansen 2003). A post-conflict situation is very complicated when warlords have gained power. They may agree to be incorporated into the state, but they thrive off an insecure environment and may serve a dual role of using their new position in the state to serve their own financial interests while also continuing to ensure that the country remains insecure to justify their provision of protection.

The civil war in Tajikistan (1992-1997) led to the development of warlord militias, bands of vigilantes and other illegally armed formations. Once they became involved, these groups had an interest in protracting the conflict. There were several attempts at a ceasefire early into the conflict that warlords undermined. Warlords violated the truce due to their desire to maintain control over lucrative enterprises such as cotton plantations and oil refineries. Warlords can expand to such an extent that whole sub-regions become affected, such as in the Horn of Africa.

CLASSIFICATIONS There are two types of warlords. Traditional warlords are noted for mostly engaging in predatory behaviors, and neo-warlords offer some form of patronage and services to their subjects. Ismael Khan is sometimes referred to as a neo-warlord – or a warlord who provides some form of public good over the territory that is under his control. Often referred to as the 'Lion of Herat,' Khan is a prominent Afghan warlord and political figure who gained influence as a mujahideen commander during the Soviet-Afghan War. After the Soviet withdrawal, he became the governor of Herat Province, where he established a semi-autonomous rule characterized by tight security and economic control, leveraging border trade with Iran to sustain his power and influence in the region. Earning millions in revenues due to his control over trade that passed through his region, he was able to provide tight security and even some economic opportunities. The Afghan government tried to incorporate him into the state, and he served as the Minister of Water and Energy since 2005 though he has favored Herat at the expense of other regions. (During the second Taliban takeover in 2021, he was captured and later released. He now lives in Iran).

MEASUREMENT As mentioned before, the conceptualization of the term warlord is plagued by controversies. For Stanski (2009: 75), the term warlord is problematic because it is used to ratify stereotypes about developing countries. Any actor that has access to an army is referred to as a warlord in Afghanistan. The term is also used to describe a wide range of actors, whether it be the leader of a criminal gang or an organized criminal thug. It has, therefore, been very challenging to come up with a common definition of a warlord and to classify warlords properly. There is no large dataset of warlord actors, but there are plenty of rich case studies of notable warlords of the twentieth and twenty-first centuries. However, also complicating matters is that it is very difficult to get a better understanding of warlords from primary field work. It is very challenging to gain access to warlords and to interview them to understand better how they behave. This helps explain why a clear conceptualization has not emerged.

EXAMPLES Warlords in Afghanistan have constantly threatened state sovereignty. The state has rarely exercised a monopoly over the legitimate use of force, giving ample room for non-state actors to take control over small territory and provide 'protection.' The power of warlords has been so potent that they even have been incorporated into the state. The Hamid Karzai (2001-2014) government placed warlords in key positions in the government regardless of their expertise or experience. According to a delegate at one point, "in the Loya Jirga ['grand council' in Pashto, a traditional assembly distinct from the parliament], 85% of the elected were with the warlords or were warlords" (Dietl 2004). This is not surprising given that the profits that some warlords were expected to make in the post-Taliban era were enough to compel many to transition and adapt to the new rules (MacGinty 2010).

Warlordism in Afghanistan became more notable after initial uprisings took place against the Soviet-backed state government in the late 1970s (and against the actual Soviet invasion in 1979). This instability led to the rise of independent commanders. After the war began, refugee camps spawned new insurgent groups. In regions where the insurgents successfully fought off the state and Soviet forces, their commanders planted opium poppies as a source of independent income and took control of transportation checkpoints to collect unofficial taxes from travelers. Many warlords emerged more powerful than ever after the conflict with the Soviet Union ended. As the state collapsed and the civil war of the 1990s developed, warlords engendered insecurity, but in some cases, they were the only actors capable of providing security, albeit in an arbitrary manner.

Warlords have undermined the capacity and legitimacy of the state in Afghanistan because they have usurped revenues that the government could collect. For example, all of the revenues from the transit trade in the region of Herat (one of the richest regions in the country) went directly to Khan, who emerged after being a prominent military commander in the war against the Soviets. Warlords also established fiefdoms on the margins of the state and exploited vulnerable populations and markets that were unable to rely on state protection. Warlords were also able to exploit multiple sources of income by extortion, levying taxes and duties, trading contraband, controlling entry points, particularly for the flow of drugs, and accessing support from foreign patrons. Many warlords also sought to benefit from limited peace in Afghanistan.

Attempts to incorporate other warlords into the army have mostly backfired. Warlords have paid lip service to the Afghan government but have been able to exercise power more or less autonomously. The resurgence of the Taliban, the botched 'Disarmament, Demobilization, and Reintegration' (DDR) program and the instability in the region meant that many warlords and militia commanders had continuing relevance (MacGinty 2010).

Scholars have looked to understand the nature of warlordism in the Afghan context, why they have emerged and how warlords should be defined. One explanation is that loyalties in Afghanistan have been more closely tied to one's tribe or village elders in contrast to the state-citizen relationship found in Western liberal democracies (Radnitz 2004: 513). However, some authors claim that the phenomenon of warlords is more a recent product of continuous warfare and has not been as culturally entrenched as compared to Europe's experience with warlordism (Marten 2006). For Barry Rubin (2002), warlordism in Afghanistan is a consequence of being forcefully integrated into the modern state system. Attempts to modernize and centralize the country led to revolts against the government and the rise of leaders of militias to defend their territory. Afghanistan has thousands of 'men of arms' that derive their power from controlling a single roadblock or small area, while other men may retain control over a much larger area. Whether or not these men can all be called warlords is up for dispute.

How to cite:

Lindstaedt, Natasha, 2025. Warlords, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

Bermeo, N., 2003. What the Democratization Literature Says – or Doesn't Say About Postwar Democratization. Global Governance, 9.

Callaghy, T.M. 1994. Africa: back to the future? Journal of Democracy, 5:4.

Charlton, R. and May, R. 1989. Warlords and militarism in Chad. Review of African Political Economy, 16:45-46.

Dietl, G., 2004. War, peace and the warlords: The case of Ismail Khan of Herat in Afghanistan. Alternatives: Turkish journal of international relations, 3:2-3.

Duffield, M., 1998. Post-modern conflict: Warlords, post-adjustment states and private protection. Civil wars, 1:1.

Emerson, R.W., 1902. English Traits. George Routledge and Sons.

Freeman, L., 2015. The African warlord revisited. Small Wars & Insurgencies, 26:5.

Giustozzi, A., 2004. 'Good' state vs. 'bad' warlords? A critique of state-building strategies in Afghanistan. LSE E Print.

Giustozzi, A., 2003. Respectable warlords? The politics of state-building in post-Taleban Afghanistan. LSE E Print.

Giustozzi, A., 2005. Warlords into businessmen: the Afghan transition 2002-2005. Preliminary findings from a research trip. University of Bradford Scholars.

Gros, J.-G., 1996. Towards a taxonomy of failed states in the New World Order: decaying Somalia, Liberia, Rwanda and Haiti. Third World Quarterly, 17:3.

Hansen, S.J., 2003. Warlords and peace strategies: the case of Somalia. Journal of Conflict Studies, 23:2.

Hills, A., 1997. Warlords, militia and conflict in contemporary Africa: A re-examination of terms. Small Wars & Insurgencies, 8:1.

Jackson, P., 2003. Warlords as alternative forms of governance. Small Wars and Insurgencies, 14:2.

Joosse, P. and Willey, R., 2020. Gender and charismatic power. Theory and Society, 49:4.

Kapp, R.A.S., 1973. The Chinese Republic: Provincial Militarism and Central Power, 1911-1938. Yale University Press.

Le Billon, P., 2001. The political ecology of war: natural resources and armed conflicts. Political geography, 20:5.

Le Billon, P., 2021. Resource wars, oil, and the Islamic state. In Rebel economies: Warlords, insurgents, humanitarians¸ Di Cosmo, N., Fassin, D. and Pinaud, C., eds., Rowman & Littlefield.

Lezhnev, S., 2005. Crafting peace: strategies to deal with warlords in collapsing states. Lexington books.

Marten, K., 2006. Warlordism in comparative perspective. International security, 31:3.

Marten, K., 2013. Warlords and governance. In The transnational governance of violence and crime: Non-state actors in security, Jakobi, A.P. and Wolf, K.D., eds., Palgrave Macmillan UK.

Mac Ginty, R. 2010. Warlords and the liberal peace: state-building in Afghanistan. Conflict, Security & Development, 10:4.

MacKinlay, J., 2000. Defining Warlords. International Peacekeeping, 7:1.

Mair, S. 2017. The New World of Privatized Violence. Challenges of Globalization: New Trends in International Politics and Society.

Malejacq, R., 2016. Warlords, intervention, and state consolidation: A typology of political orders in weak and failed states. Security Studies, 25:1.

Mukhopadhyay, D. 2009. Disguised warlordism and combatanthood in Balkh: The persistence of informal power in the formal Afghan state. Conflict, Security & Development, 9:4.

Ponzio, R.J. Democratic peacebuilding: aiding Afghanistan and other fragile states. Oxford University Press.

Radnitz, S., 2004. Working with the warlords: designing an ethnofederal system for Afghanistan. Regional & Federal Studies, 14:4.

Roberts, J.A.G. 1989. Warlordism in China. Review of African Political Economy, 16:45-46.

Robinson, T.P., 2001. Twenty-First Century Warlords: Diagnosis and Treatment? Defence Studies, 1:1.

Rubin, B.R., 2002. The fragmentation of Afghanistan: State formation and collapse in the international system. Yale University Press.

Sheridan, J.E. 1966. Chinese Warlord: The Career of Feng Yü-hsiang (Vol. 70). Stanford University Press.

Sheridan, J.E. 1983. Nationalist China at War. Military Defeats and Political Collapse 1937-45.

Thomas, T.S., Kiser, S.D. and Casebeer, W.D. 2005. Warlords rising: Confronting violent non-state actors. Lexington Books.

Waldorf, L. 2017. Apotheosis of a warlord: Paul Kagame. In Warlord democrats in Africa: Ex-military leaders and electoral politics, Themnér, A., ed., Zed Books.

Wilbur, C.M., 1968. The influence of the past: how the early years helped to shape the future of the Chinese communist party. The China Quarterly, 36.

Wantchekon, L. 2004. The paradox of "warlord" democracy: A theoretical investigation. American Political Science Review, 98:1.

APPENDIX

LEGAL TENDER, LOYAL SUBJECTS – THE POLITICS OF ORNAMENTAL CURRENCY

50-Ruble, Imperial Russia (1899, issued 1910-1914), depicting Tsar Nicholas I.

In the ancient world, the expansion of coinage as the preferred method of trading and paying taxes, resulted in the expanded use of featured images of gods and royal symbols. The earliest known depiction of a ruler's portrait on currency dates back to around 400 BCE, when Tissaphernes, a Persian satrap, minted coins bearing his image. This was considered a bold and potentially blasphemous move at the time

The use of ruler imagery on coins continued through the ages and the practice served to impress audiences with the regal power of the ruling body and legitimize their authority. (Hymans 2022) The tradition of depicting rulers' images on currency was applied to banknotes only in the eighteenth century, even though the invention of paper money took place much earlier. The oldest surviving banknote are those of the 'Great Ming Treasure Note' (大明宝钞 – dà míng bǎo chāo) first printed during the reign of the Hongwu Emperor (1368-1398) – probably no earlier than 1375. (And it is actually that currency's hyperinflation by the mid-fifteenth century that contributed to its survival. With people treating the notes as worthless, stuffing large piles of useless banknotes into jars, wooden boxes and later forgetting about them.) (Guinness world record, 2024; Metcalfe 2016)

King George II of Great Britain was the first ruler to appear on a banknote in 1727, when he instructed the Royal Bank of Scotland to issue a set of notes featuring his royal portrait. This marked a significant shift in currency design and set a precedent for future banknote imagery.

Strengthened by the rise of nationalism, currency design evolved to incorporate more complex narratives and symbols. Coins and banknotes began to feature national symbols, regalia, and important historical figures. This shift allowed regimes to express continuity, add historical weight to their origin stories, and showcase their national evolution. Banknotes, as 'Ur-artifacts of print capitalism,' played a significant role in forming and spreading national imaginaries. Unlike other images, banknotes had nearly universal viewership because their use was essential for participation in the monetary system. (Purtle 2009)

The inclusion of detailed pictures and illustrations on banknotes served a dual purpose: storytelling and anti-counterfeiting. Complex imagery made notes harder to copy and easier to verify, addressing the practical need for security in currency design. The stories banknotes aim to tell, however, can be very different.

The greenbacks, introduced under the Legal Tender Act of 25 February 1862, marked a major shift in US currency during the Civil War. Issued to finance the war and address gold and silver shortages, they were declared legal tender, accepted for debts as equivalent to specie despite being non-redeemable for coins. Between March 1862 and March 1863, denominations from $1 to $1,000 were issued, featuring historical vignettes like Columbus and Washington crossing the Delaware to educate the public about US history. The US Treasury explicitly stated that these designs aimed to "teach the masses the prominent periods in our country's history" (Helleiner 2003: 106; Cooper 2009: 5).

Currency design has often reflected broader cultural and political trends. For instance, some countries have used banknotes to showcase touristic highlights, effectively turning currency into miniature guidebooks. In 1910, the Qing government issued a new law to standardize currency (as presented here), making the notes of the Da-Qing Bank (大清銀行) the only legal tender paper money in China. As part of this initiative, they commissioned new banknote designs that incorporated significant cultural and architectural elements. (Theobald 2016) This tradition took root and even today, the current Rénmínbì notes feature sites like the Great Hall of the People (in Beijing), Potala Palace (in Lhasa, Tibet), and Li River (in Guilin, Guangxi Province). This approach highlights the wealth, conquests and national treasures of a country, making banknotes a form of cultural ambassadorship.

10 Dollar, Qing dynasty (1910), depicting Emperor Zaifeng, Prince Chun of the First Rank. (source: public domain)

Revolutionary regimes (leftist and anti-colonial ones in particular) have also used banknotes to stress economic development and technological advancements. Scenes of industrial progress, hydroelectric dams, bountiful harvests, or generic images of the 'common folk,' often depicted in socialist realist style, have been used to convey messages of economic progress, welfare and modernization. This style has been copied, adapted, and reinvented in several world regions.

The recurrent use of certain imagery, such as the depiction of Simón Bolívar, the renowned South American liberator on Argentinean, Bolivian, Colombian, Ecuadorian, Peruvian and Venezuelan banknotes, aims to project a common origin and legacy. In Venezuela's turbulent history, his recent reappearance on banknotes served to underscore an image of national stability and boost faith in the strength of the currency.

The gender gap remains Grand Canyon-like, with less than ten percent of portraited notes featuring (non-anonymous) female images. The percentage drops closer to five percent if one excludes Queen Elizabeth II of Great Britain. Elizabeth II's image graced the currencies of 33 different countries (as shown in the example from the Bahamas), spanning from Australia to various Caribbean nations. She held the distinction of being the most frequently depicted person on banknotes and coins worldwide through a combination of her unprecedented 70-year reign as the British monarch and head of the Commonwealth, boosted by her early appearances on currency (before her coronation). (Fiori 2024)

Regime changes often bring about significant alterations in banknote artwork. In democratic societies, the practice of depicting current rulers is often abandoned due to its association with authoritarian legacies. Instead, historical or mythical figures, cultural icons, inventors, social reformers, or even (rarely) central bank officials or finance ministers may be featured. After periods of political transition, countries may choose to return to historically significant or unifying symbols that are less controversial. This approach allows for a balance between honoring national heritage and avoiding political sensitivities.

The evolution of currency imagery from simple depictions of rulers to complex representations of national identity reflects broader historical, political, and cultural changes. As a medium that circulates widely among a population, currency serves not only as a means of economic exchange but also as a powerful tool for conveying messages about national values, achievements, and aspirations. The careful selection and design of currency imagery continue to play a significant role in shaping public perceptions and reinforcing national narratives. These can really evoke culture clashes.

For example, in 2016 the Obama administration announced plans to replace Andrew Jackson, a former president and slaveholder, with Harriet Tubman, the abolitionist and Underground Railroad leader, on the bill's front. The redesign was originally scheduled for unveiling in 2020. However, during Trump's first presidency, his administration delayed the process. US Treasury Secretary Steven Mnuchin stated that the delay was due to the need for anti-counterfeiting measures and new printing technology, pushing the timeline to 2030. Critics argued that this explanation was a pretext to avoid implementing the change during Trump's tenure. Reports suggested that Mnuchin delayed the redesign to prevent Trump from halting it altogether, as Trump had publicly opposed replacing Jackson with Tubman, calling it "pure political correctness." He has expressed admiration for Jackson and resisted efforts to remove him from the bill. (Durkin 2019)

The images of banknotes depicted throughout the 50 Cents, The Bahamas (2019), depicting Queen Elizabeth II, wearing the Burmese Ruby Tiara.

Encyclopedia Tyrannica touch upon these themes. Sometimes a selected grouping of two to three banknotes brings together rulers with similar origins or representing specific regimes types; in other cases, there is a larger 'story' or anecdote to be told, which can be read below.

All banknotes are from the private collection of the co-editor (JVdB) unless listed otherwise.

Page XXX Saddam Hussein in Iraq and the Assad family – Hafez al-Assad and his son Bashar al-Assad – in Syria are deeply intertwined with the history and evolution of the Arab Socialist Baʿath Party (cf. Box 4.5), shaping the political trajectories of their respective countries through authoritarian rule, party dominance, and the personalization of power.

In Iraq, Saddam Hussein rose through the ranks of Baʿath Party, which espoused Arab nationalism and socialism, eventually taking full control in 1979 after a series of purges and consolidating all major state and party positions under his authority. Under Saddam, the Baʿath Party became the backbone of a one-party state, using a mix of violent repression, pervasive surveillance, patronage, and a personality cult to maintain its grip on society and eliminate opposition. The party's ideology and apparatus were used to integrate, and often coerce, Iraqis into supporting the regime, making party membership essential for advancement in public life. Saddam's rule was marked by wars (notably with Iran and Kuwait), brutal suppression of internal dissent, and the transformation of the Ba'athist ideology into a vehicle for his personal power. After his overthrow in 2003, the Baʿath Ba'ath Party was banned, and its remnants played a role in later insurgencies.

In Syria, the Baʿath Party seized power in 1963 and, after internal purges and coups, Hafez al-Assad established his sole leadership in 1970, transforming the party into a tool for consolidating his family's control over the state. The Syrian Baʿath, while sharing ideological roots with its Iraqi counterpart, developed its own variant – 'Assadism' – marked by a strong personality cult, the dominance of the security apparatus, and tight intertwining of party and state institutions. The party became the central pillar of an authoritarian system, facilitating mass mobilization, patronage, and the exclusion of real political opposition. Bashar al-Assad inherited this system in 2000, maintaining its authoritarian structure and Baʿathist dominance despite initial hopes for reform. During the Syrian civil war, the party remained the regime's main organizational base, but its legitimacy and influence plummeted, culminating in its formal dissolution after Bashar's sudden ouster in 2024.

Both Saddam Hussein and the Assad rulers managed to usurp their historic Baʿath parties and transform them into vehicles for personalist rule: watering down their original pan-Arab socialist ideals in order to accommodate ultra-nationalist frames, their personality cults, and (in the latter case) dynastic succession.

Page 26 The three independence leaders of Namibia, Zambia, and Tanzania – Sam Nujoma, Kenneth Kaunda, and Julius Nyerere, respectively – are perceived as complex figures whose legacies blend elements of visionary leadership with authoritarian tendencies. Kaunda and Nyerere were educators by profession before they entered politics, Nujoma pursued higher education later in life. All three contributed to significant educational reforms in their states.

Sam Nujoma, Namibia's founding president, is celebrated as a liberation hero who led the country to independence in 1990 after decades of guerrilla warfare against South African Apartheid rule. His leadership fostered national unity and stability in a deeply divided society. However, his tenure was marked by autocratic tendencies, including intolerance for dissent within SWAPO during exile, accusations of torture in liberation camps, and controversies surrounding his third term in office.

Kenneth Kaunda, Zambia's first president, is remembered for his philosophy of 'Zambian Humanism,' which emphasized inclusivity and mutual aid. He achieved independence peacefully in 1964 and supported liberation movements across southern Africa. Despite his early idealism, Kaunda established a one-party state and faced criticism for economic mismanagement during his 27-year rule. His dignified departure from power in 1991 transformed him into a respected elder statesman.

Julius Nyerere (revered as Mwalimu – 'Teacher' in Kiswahili), Tanzania's first president, is revered for his intellectual leadership and commitment to African socialism through his ujamaa philosophy. He promoted egalitarianism and unity while supporting liberation movements across Africa. However, his policies of forced rural collectivization and nationalization faced resistance and economic hardship. Nyerere voluntarily retired in 1985 and supported multiparty reforms in 1992, reinforcing his reputation as a moral leader.

Their legacies are thus seen as a mix of transformative leadership and autocratic tendencies typical for liberation movements and single party regimes, shaped by the challenges of post-colonial state-building.

Page 244 This selection represents three archetypical strongmen (military personalist rulers) from Sub Saharan Africa. Mobutu Sese Seko, Idi Amin, and Yahya Jammeh each managed to stay in power beyond the average life spans of military regimes. Two of them for remarkably long periods: Mobutu for 32 years in Zaire (now the Democratic Republic of Congo) and Jammeh for 22 years in The Gambia.

Joseph Mobutu (see also Box 1.7) consolidated his rule through a mix of brutal repression and co-optation. Early in his regime, he publicly executed rivals and coup plotters to instill fear and deter dissent, while later he skillfully used patronage, distributing state resources and positions to buy loyalty and neutralize opposition. Mobutu also exploited Cold War dynamics, securing substantial financial and military backing despite his regime's corruption and human rights abuses. After Mobutu was ousted in May 1997, the new rebel government of Laurent-Désiré Kabila quickly abandoned the name 'Zaire' and reverted the country's name to the Democratic Republic of the Congo. The currency, which under Mobutu had been the zaïre (and, after 1993, the nouveau zaïre), was also replaced. The latter had suffered from hyperinflation and bore Mobutu's image on all denominations, but continued to circulate briefly during the tumultuous political transition. However, in July 1998, the Congolese franc was reintroduced as the official currency, replacing the nouveau zaïre at a rate of 1 to 100,000 new zaires.

There are persistent reports and some photographic evidence suggesting that, in certain areas and for a brief period during the transition, authorities or individuals attempted to deface these notes by punching out or cutting out Mobutu's face from the bills, particularly on high-denomination notes like the 20,000 nouveau zaïre, to symbolically distance the country from the former dictator. However, while the existence of such altered notes is supported by some circumstantial evidence, there is no definitive official documentation confirming this as a widespread or sanctioned practice

Idi Amin's rule in Uganda was rooted in his military background and his willingness to use extreme violence to eliminate real or perceived threats. After seizing power from Milton Obote in a coup, he ruled as a military dictator, relying on the army and secret police to enforce his authority and suppress opposition. Amin's regime was marked by arbitrary violence, ethnic persecution, and mass killings, creating a climate of fear that stifled dissent. He also manipulated ethnic divisions to maintain support among key groups in the military, while purging rivals and potential challengers. Amin's populist rhetoric and initial gestures to improve the lives of ordinary Ugandans helped him consolidate power, but his erratic governance and brutality ultimately isolated him domestically and internationally, leading to his overthrow by a Tanzanian-led force – a war he had started himself. After his rule, Ugandan presidents were no longer portrayed on banknotes.

Yahya Jammeh, who came to power in a 1994 military coup, maintained his grip on The Gambia through a combination of legal manipulation, repression, and divide-and-rule tactics. He engineered constitutional changes to remove term limits and lower barriers to re-election, while using the security services, including the notorious National Intelligence Agency, to intimidate, imprison, or eliminate opponents. Jammeh frequently reshuffled his cabinet and dismissed officials to prevent the emergence of rivals, and he manipulated the electoral process through intimidation, legal obstacles for opposition candidates, and control over the electoral commission. His regime was further bolstered by a fractured opposition and a climate of fear, with arbitrary arrests, disappearances, and attacks on the media commonplace. Ultimately, Jammeh's reliance on the military was crucial: he stayed in power as long as he retained the loyalty of the armed forces, and only fled into exile after the military refused to support him after his electoral defeat in 2016. (Still, a foreign invasion was needed to oust him.)

The earliest dalasi notes (1971-1994) featured the portrait of Jammeh's predecessor, (founding) president Sir Dawda Kairaba Jawara and depicted scenes of everyday Gambian life. By 2015, Jammeh's image had been placed on all dalasi banknotes, a move widely criticized and the apex of his personality cult. In 2017, after his ouster, the Central Bank undertook a phased process to remove his portrait from the country's currency. The move away from depicting political leaders toward national symbols and wildlife reflects a broader effort to promote unity.

Page 320 Here are gathered the independence leaders (and first rulers) of the former Portuguese African colonies. The first note features a portrait of Amílcar Cabral, an older depiction of the revolutionary leader who played a pivotal role in the independence movements of Cape Verde and Guinea-Bissau. Cabral was not only a political leader but also an intellectual who emphasized the importance of cultural identity and unity in the struggle against Portuguese colonial rule. The assassination of Cabral in January 1973 was a pivotal moment that exposed and deepened the tensions within the African Party for the Independence of Guinea and Cape Verde (PAIGC), ultimately leading to the split between Guinea-Bissau and Cape Verde. Cabral had sought to bridge ethnic and political divides, particularly between Cape Verdeans, who dominated the PAIGC leadership, and Bissau-Guineans, who formed the majority of its rank-and-file fighters. His murder, orchestrated by disgruntled Guinean members of the PAIGC with possible Portuguese complicity, highlighted these divisions. After his death, Luís Cabral, Amílcar's half-brother and a Cape Verdean, assumed leadership in Guinea-Bissau, but resentment over Cape Verdean dominance persisted. This culminated in a 1980 coup led by João Bernardo Vieira in Guinea-Bissau, which ousted Luís Cabral and severed ties with Cape Verde.

The 100 Meticais banknote from Mozambique, issued in 1989, reflects the country's post-independence identity and its struggle for liberation. The obverse of the note prominently features Eduardo Mondlane, the founding president of FRELIMO (Front for the Liberation of Mozambique) and a key figure in the liberation struggle. Alongside his portrait, the design includes an image of five FRELIMO soldiers raising the national flag on 25 June 1975, at Machava Stadium in Maputo, commemorating the day Mozambique gained independence. (The watermark reveals Samora Moisés Machel, the country's first president, but the main locus of power was FRELIMO.) Mozambique stands out as the only country in the world to feature a modern firearm, specifically an AK-47 with a bayonet, on its national flag, however other countries such as Zimbabwe, Burkina Faso, and East Timor likewise incorporated AK-47s into their coats of arms to honor their struggles for sovereignty.

The 5 Kwanza banknote of Angola from 1999 features portraits of António Agostinho Neto and José Eduardo dos Santos. Neto, depicted in the foreground, was Angola's first president (1975-1979) and a key leader in the Popular Movement for the Liberation of Angola (MPLA), which led the struggle for independence. He is also celebrated as a poet and symbol of national liberation. José Eduardo dos Santos, shown in the background, succeeded Neto as president and served from 1979 to 2017, playing a central role in Angola's post-independence political landscape and civil war. Dos Santos remains a divisive figure in Angola's history – praised as an 'architect of peace' by some while considered 'kleptocracy incarnated' by most. His eldest daughter, Isabel dos Santos (currently in exile in Dubai) became Africa's richest woman, amassing a fortune estimated at $3.5 billion through stakes in key industries like oil, telecommunications, and banking.

Page 428 These thematically selected banknote depictions of three (in)famous East Asian ideologues present the radically different self-legitimation strategies of their respective communist regimes.

The portrait of Mao Zedong appears on all denominations of the current (fifth) series of the Chinese Rénmínbì (People's currency), which began progressive introduction in 1999, approximately 23 years after his death in 1976. The portrait, created by artist Liu Wenxi, shows Mao facing slightly forward with a solemn expression. (Ti 2013) This posthumous representation differs significantly from the Vietnamese and North Korean approaches, as it came decades after Mao's death during China's reform period. The delayed introduction of Mao's universal portrait on currency suggests a deliberate decision to canonize his image as the eternal figurehead of Chinese communism even as the country was pursuing economic liberalization. This timing represents a careful balance between honoring the regime's founder while moving beyond the excesses of his rule. His universal presence across all values of currency ensures that every citizen, regardless of economic status, regularly interacts with Mao's image, symbolizing his position as the foundational figure of modern China, transcending economic stratification and touching every aspect of daily financial life.

In stark contrast to Mao, Ho Chi Minh's portrait appeared on Vietnamese banknotes already in 1946, when he had been President for only four months. This remarkably early introduction demonstrates the immediate effort to establish his authority and personality cult. Artists Nguyen Sang and Mai Van Hien created his portrait without ever meeting him in person as Ho spent much time underground. (Quoc 2021) Ho Chi Minh's image continued to appear on all denominations of Vietnamese currency after his death in 1969 and remains there today. The early and continued use of his portrait reflects both the rapid canonization of his leadership and the enduring power of his image as a unifying national symbol for Vietnam. His ubiquitous portrayal emphasizes his role as Bác Hồ ('Uncle Ho'), a familiar, familial figure who sacrificed his personal happiness for the nation. In a letter allegedly written in 1948, Ho stated, 'I do not have a family, and do not have children either. Vietnam is the great family of mine.' (Linh 2021)

Kim Il-Sung's portrait first appeared on North Korean currency in 1979 on the 100-won note, which was then the highest denomination bill. This occurred during his lifetime, as he died in 1994. He is the only real person who appears on the country's bills, other people's images are generic representations of working classes (a farmer, laborer, intellectual). (The second currency reform in 1959 started depicting women as well, although for similar ideological purposes.) In the original (1979, 100-won) edition, Kim appeared wearing a traditional Mao suit with a solemn expression. By the 1992 currency reform, (on the 1000- and 5000-won note (presented here), issued 2002-2006) his image had changed to show him in a Western suit and necktie, against a backdrop of North Korea's national flower. After the fifth currency reform, the 2008 depiction on the 5000-won note showed a widely smiling Kim Il-Sung, benevolently looking out for his people after his death. (KBS 2001)

While his portrayal on currency evolved significantly over time, reflecting changing political needs and symbolism, the regime deliberately restricted Kim's image to high-value notes to enhance reverence and scarcity, unlike the more democratic approach of universal representation used in China and Vietnam. "Workers and farmers seldom see large bills. Even if they may get one somehow, they don't put it into their pockets or crumple it. Instead, they hold on to the precious note. I think that's why the portrait of Kim Il-sung is printed on the highest bill." (KBS 2001) Most remarkably, after Kim Jong-un came to power, a new bill issued in 2014 removed Kim Il-Sung's portrait entirely, replacing it with an image of his birthplace at Mangyeongdae (BBC 2014), indicating that the founder's personality cult brings with shoes too big to fill for the grandson and current ruler.

Page 518 These three banknotes proverbially embody 'the good, the bad and the ugly' when it comes to transitions of absolute monarchy, when considering the evolution of this regime type in South(east) Asia.

Jigme Khesar Namgyel Wangchuck, the current King of Bhutan, ascended the throne in 2006 and was formally crowned in 2008. His reign marks the start of a new political era and the transition to democratic rule. His father, King Jigme Singye Wangchuck reformed Bhutan and introduced constitutional monarchy in 2008 – himself abdicating in 2006 in favor of his son – because he believed that decentralizing power and preemptively transitioning to democracy would ensure long-term stability and empower the Bhutanese people (while preventing a revolution in the long run).

In contrast, Sultan Hassanal Bolkiah, remains the last absolute monarch of the Indo-Pacific, holding the positions of Sultan, Prime Minister, Minister of Finance, Minister of Defense, Commander of the Armed Forces, Chief of Police, and Supreme Leader of Islam, among others. He never needed to reform Brunei's political regime primarily because of the country's immense natural resource wealth, particularly oil and gas, which has enabled him to maintain an unchallenged grip on power and effectively neutralize potential sources of domestic discontent. Such rents have allowed the Sultan to provide extensive welfare programs, high standards of living, and generous state benefits to the population, which in turn has reduced public pressure for political liberalization or reform. The Sultan has also demonstrated adaptability in consolidating his rule. For example, the introduction of Sharia law in recent years has served a dual purpose: it both strengthens domestic control – particularly over youth and restless groups excluded from government employment – and aligns Brunei more closely with wealthy Gulf states, potentially attracting investment and further bolstering the regime's financial base.

Birendra Bir Bikram, with the royal (sur-)name of 'Shah Dev' was King of Nepal from 1972 until he met an ugly end (assassination) in 2001. His long reign marked a significant period in Nepalese history, encompassing the transition from absolute monarchy to constitutional monarchy (in response to mass pro-democracy protests and civil unrest) as well as a time of major political, social, and economic reforms.

During his nearly three-decade rule King Birendra became notable in the numismatic world for his depiction on Nepalese banknotes, which underwent distinct stylistic and thematic changes over time. This 1-Rupee note (presented here) shows him in dress uniform and cap, the Pashupatinath Temple, and a watermark window. The 2-Rupee note, in contrast, features his likeness in the traditional Nepalese crown, decorated with feathers of the bird of paradise.

Alas, during the event now known as the 'Nepalese royal massacre' at the Narayanhiti Palace in Kathmandu, Crown Prince Dipendra, Birendra's son, opened fire on his family during a private gathering killing King Birendra, Queen Aishwarya, and seven other members of the royal family before turning the gun on himself. His motivations behind this attack remain unclear to this day. Dipendra fell into a coma after shooting himself and was declared king while unconscious, but he died three days later without regaining consciousness. After the deaths, King Birendra's brother Gyanendra ascended the throne, but the monarchy's legitimacy was severely undermined, ultimately contributing to its abolition in 2008 ending the 240-year Shah dynasty (1768-2008).

Page 634 Communist and socialist regimes have historically demonstrated a strong preference for depicting agricultural and technological progress on their banknotes. This imagery directly connects to core ideological principles and policy priorities within these systems. Communist regimes in the twentieth century deployed a common visual language through banknote imagery, creating narratives that aligned with their political and economic objectives. Farming imagery, in particular, came to dominate banknote design across the communist world. This prevalence is not coincidental. All communist regimes pursued extensive agricultural reform, fundamentally altering both land ownership structures and farming practices. Banknotes served as portable propaganda, reinforcing these transformative policies. The visual representation of agricultural collectivization, industrial development, and technological advancement legitimized regime priorities while presenting an idealized version of the 'socialist reality' these governments sought to create. (Hockenhull 2020)

The 500 Lao Kip banknote issued in 1988 is a classic example of communist iconography. The reverse (shown here) portrays workers harvesting coffee beans in the Bolaven Plateau. This imagery highlights a key export crop, connecting domestic agriculture to international trade while celebrating the labor of agricultural workers. The 2002 North Korean 5-won-note prominently features technological progress through its focus on hydroelectric power. The obverse includes the state emblem depicting a hydroelectric power station, along with symbols of nuclear power and 'two partisan men.' The reverse, shown here, depicts the Hwanggang hydroelectric dam and power station. The 100 Guinea franc banknote continues to mimic these trends with the depiction of collective agricultural labor and cash crop production (on the reverse side, presented here).

Page 704 The Zimbabwe hyperinflation crisis, peaking at 79.6 billion percent monthly inflation in November 2008, led to an overall loss of 99.9% of its value within one year. It was a man-made financial disaster and the confluent result of systemic policy failures and economic mismanagement. The 100 billion-dollar notes emerged as both a symptom and symbol of this collapse by July 2008 (roughly equating the price of three eggs). The printing of the 10-billion-dollar banknote (presented here) alongside several 'lower' denominations (1-, 10-, 100-, 200-, 500-million-dollar and 1-, 5-billion-dollar notes) reflected the currency's ongoing catastrophic devaluation months later. They were all issued by 19 December 2008 and were supplanted a few weeks later (on 16 January 2009) by the even more ridiculous 100-trillion-dollar note. In February 2009 a new (the fourth) Zimbabwean currency was introduced, removing 12 zeros from all old bills, but universal loss of confidence in the national money, led people to shift to South African rand and US dollars instead. (Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, 2011)

The hyperinflation crisis was primarily caused by a combination of disastrous land reform policies – forcibly redistributed farmland from white commercial farmers to black Zimbabweans, often without compensation or support – that decimated agricultural output by 80%, excessive money printing by the Reserve Bank of Zimbabwe to finance government deficits and political patronage, and the subsequent collapse of confidence in the national currency. These factors were compounded by international isolation due to sanctions, widespread corruption, and the imposition of price controls, which led to severe shortages and the emergence of black markets. As the economy spiraled, the government repeatedly issued ever-larger denominations, such as the iconic billion-dollar bills, in a futile attempt to keep pace with skyrocketing prices, ultimately rendering the currency worthless and forcing the country to abandon it in favor of foreign currencies. (Bushu & Kufakurinani 2024)

Page 792 This page presents two interesting banknotes from Burma (now Myanmar). The issuance of the 35-kyat banknote by Ne Win, Burma's military dictator from 1962 to 1988, reflects the eccentric intersection of superstition, authoritarian control, and economic mismanagement that characterized his regime. Ne Win's decision to introduce this unusual denomination was reportedly influenced by his belief in numerology and astrology, which played a significant role in his leadership style and policy-making. (Wynalda 2015)

Ne Win was deeply superstitious and relied heavily on astrologers to guide his decisions. The issuance of the 35-kyat note in 1986 was part of a broader series of odd denominations, including 15-, 75-, 45- and 90-kyat notes. These denominations deviated from conventional monetary systems, which typically use multiples of five or ten for ease of transactions. The choice of the 35-kyat denomination was allegedly based on advice from Ne Win's numerologist, who deemed it luckier than the previously issued 50-kyat note. This belief in the auspiciousness of certain numbers extended to later denominations divisible by nine, such as the 45- and 90-kyat notes issued in 1987. (Wynalda 2015)

These unconventional banknotes were emblematic of Ne Win's erratic economic policies. His government pursued autarky – economic self-sufficiency – and nationalized industries, leading to widespread poverty and reliance on black markets. The introduction of these odd denominations compounded economic instability. In a drastic move in September 1987, Ne Win demonetized several large denominations, including the 35-kyat note, rendering approximately 75% of the nation's currency worthless overnight without compensation. This decision wiped out savings across Burma, exacerbated financial hardship, and triggered widespread protests that culminated in the '8888 uprising' against his regime. (Wakeman & San San Tin 2009)

The story of the 1-kyat banknote in Burma is tied to a compelling anecdote that illustrates the interplay between political symbolism, resistance, and authoritarian control. This tale encapsulates how mundane objects, like currency, can be converted into potent tools of dissent and political expression under oppressive regimes.

Burma's post-independence history is marked by prolonged civil conflict and authoritarian rule, beginning with General Aung San's assassination in 1947. Aung San, a national hero and architect of Burma's independence, became a symbol of hope and resistance. His daughter, Aung San Suu Kyi, later inherited his legacy, leading a nonviolent movement for democracy inspired by figures like Mahatma Gandhi and Martin Luther King Jr. However, the military junta that seized power in 1988 suppressed her efforts through arrests and house arrests, even criminalizing the mere display of her image.

In this context, the 1-kyat banknote emerged as a subtle yet powerful form of resistance. Issued by the junta in 1989 to honor General Aung San, the note bore his portrait. However, an unknown engraver altered the watermark to resemble Aung San Suu Kyi's likeness – an act of defiance against the regime's suppression of her image. For months before its withdrawal, citizens could hold their currency to the light and see their democratic leader symbolically embedded within the state's apparatus of control. The banknote also contained other covert messages referencing the 1988 pro-democracy protests (the '8888 Uprising'), such as concentric rings around an eight-petalled flower – a subtle nod to the movement's date. (Wynalda 2015; Goodman, no date)

Page 910 The 50-ruble banknote issued by the Russian Empire in 1899 prominently features a portrait of Tsar Nicholas I, not Nicholas II, despite the latter being the reigning emperor at the time of the note's issue. Tsar Nicholas I reigned from 1825 to 1855 and became synonymous with autocracy, militarism, and bureaucratic centralization. Nicholas I ascended the throne after his father was assassinated, suppressing the Decembrist revolt, and his rule was marked by the expansion of Russian territory in the Caucasus, the defeat of uprisings in Poland and Hungary, and a rigid, reactionary domestic policy that earned him the reputation of the 'Gendarme of Europe' due to his relentless suppression of dissent and revolutionary movements. Despite initial military successes, his reign ended in the humiliation of the Crimean War, exposing the empire's administrative and military weaknesses.

This 1899 50-ruble banknote series is recognized for its high-quality design and craftsmanship, typical of late imperial Russian paper money. It was part of a series of state credit notes issued in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, at a time when the Russian ruble was considered a strong and stable currency due to its standardized gold backing. The text on the front states that the State Bank exchanges these credit notes for gold coins without restriction, specifying the gold content per ruble, reflecting the note's backing by gold reserves at the time. (One ruble was to contain 17.424 grains of pure gold, which is equivalent to approximately 0.774 grams of gold per ruble.)

The example presented is one of the rarer variations left (with a signature of the state bank director Aleksey Vladimirovich Konshin, who held the position from 1910 to 1914 and was succeeded by Pyotr Lvovich Shipov (in office: 1914-1917), whose signature most commonly features on this banknote series).

Page 920 Only these two historical figures – Damdin Sükhbaatar and Chinggis Khan – have been depicted as primary portrait subjects on Mongolian banknotes in regular circulation, dominating national numismatic imaginary in the last 100 hundred years.

The transition from Damdin Sükhbaatar to Chinggis Khan as the primary figures on Mongolian banknotes reflects a profound ideological shift from Soviet-aligned communism to a post-socialist reaffirmation of Mongolia's imperial heritage and national identity after the 1990 democratic revolution, serving as a visual manifesto of ideological reorientation.

Damdin Sükhbaatar, the revolutionary leader who spearheaded Mongolia's 1921 independence from China and established the Mongolian People's Republic, became the face of Mongolian currency during the socialist era. His portrait first appeared on all banknotes in 1939 and remained dominant for over 50 years. As the 'Mongolian Lenin,' Sükhbaatar symbolized the Soviet-aligned communist regime's ideals-revolutionary struggle, proletarian unity, and anti-imperialism. Smaller denominations (e.g., 10-100 Tögrög) retained his image even after 1993 (but in national dress, not Soviet attire), preserving a link to Mongolia's modern statehood while diminishing his ideological prominence.

The 1993 currency reform marked a decisive break. Chinggis Khan, founder of the Mongol Empire, replaced Sükhbaatar on high-value notes (500-20,000 Tögrög), a move coinciding with Mongolia's democratic transition and ideological juncture to reclaim its pre-Soviet identity and nationalist revival.

Page 944 As of 2025, Turkmenistan is the only post-Soviet Central Asian country that has depicted a contemporary ruler on its banknotes (in stark contrast to the prevalence of these rulers' images everywhere else). Turkmenistan's currency history reflects the evolution of its political personality cults. Under President Saparmurat Niyazov, known as Türkmenbaşy or 'Father of all Turkmens,' early banknotes (1993-2000) included cultural imagery alongside his portraits. By 2005, Niyazov's image dominated all denominations including coins (save the lowly 1- and 5-manat notes), showcasing the deepening personality cult during his rule. His sudden death in 2006 marked a shift under successor Gurbanguly Berdymukhammedov, who dismantled the extreme cult of Niyazov. In 2009, new banknotes featured Niyazov on only one of six denominations (just the 500-manat note, never released), signaling a radical departure from his pervasive influence. (Cooper 2009: 26; Litvak 2009) At the same time, he began cultivating his own personality cult, with his portraits replacing Niyazov's in public spaces and vanity projects like golden statues of himself.

How to cite:

Van den Bosch, J.J.J., 2025. Appendix: Legal Tender, Loyal Subjects – The Politics of Ornamental Currency, Encyclopedia Tyrannica: A Research Guide to Authoritarianism, Van den Bosch, J.J.J. and Lindstaedt, N., eds., ibidem Verlag.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

BBC, 2014. North Korea 'drops Kim Il-sung from new banknotes.' BBC News.

Bushu, N. and Kufakurinani, U., 2024. The Zimbabwean Economic Crisis, Oxford Research Encyclopedia of African History.

Cooper, S., 2009. Currency, identity, and nation-building: national currency choices in the post-Soviet states. APSA 2009 Toronto Meeting Paper.

Durkin, E., 2019. Outrage as Trump delays putting Harriet Tubman on $20 bill until 2026. The Guardian.

Federal Reserve Bank of Dallas, 2011. Globalization and Monetary Policy Institute Annual Report 2011.

Fiori, A., 2024. Portraits on banknotes: a study of the gender gap, 872, Bank of Italy.

Goodman, J., no date. Dissident Banknote – Burma. Works That Work.

Guinness world record, 2024. Oldest banknote.

Helleiner, E., 2003. The Making of National Money: Territorial Currencies in Historical, Perspective. Cornell University Press.

Hockenhull, T., 2020. Peasants, Produce and Tractors: Farming Scenes on Communist Banknotes. International Bank Note Society Journal, 59:2.

Hymans, J.E., 2022. It's All about the Benjamins: Why Banknotes Look as They Do, and Why You Should Care. Brown Journal of World Affairs, 29.

KBS, 2021. Inside North Korea: Banknote Designs in N. Korea (1) - Figures. KBS World Radio.

Linh, L., 2021. The Cult of Ho Chi Minh: Solemnization through Public Monuments and Propaganda Posters. Dogma.

Litvak, D., 2009. Turkmenistan new note family confirmed. Banknotenews.com.

Metcalfe, T., 2016. Stashed Cash: Rare Ming Dynasty Banknote Found Inside Chinese Sculpture. Life Science.

Purtle, J., 2009. Money Making Nation: Picturing Political Economy in Banknotes of the Qing-Republican Transition. Looking Modern: East Asian Visual Culture from Treaty Ports to World War II.

Quoc, P., 2021. President Ho Chi Minh's image on Vietnam's banknotes. Vietnamnet Global.

Theobald, U., 2016. Qing Period Paper Money, Encyclopaedia on Chinese History, Literature and Art. ChinaKnowledge.de.

Ti, Z., 2013. Brush with history. China Daily.

Truitt, A., [2020] 2023. Money. The Open Encyclopedia of Anthropology, Stein, F., ed. Facsimile of the first edition in The Cambridge Encyclopedia of Anthropology.

Tschoegl, A.E., 2004. Change the regime–change the money: Bulgarian banknotes, 1885-2003. Balkanologie. Revue d'études pluridisciplinaires, 8:2.

Wakeman, C. and San San Tin, 2009. No Time for Dreams: Living in Burma under Military Rule. Rowman & Littlefield Publishers

Wynalda, S., 2015. 10 Banknotes with Hidden Images and Symbols. Listverse.com.

INDEX

1 Tögrög, Mongolian People's Republic (1955), depicting Damdin Sükhbaatar, founding member of the Mongolian People's Party and revolutionary hero.

1000 Tögrög, Mongolia (2013), depicting Chinggis Khan, founding emperor of the Mongol Empire.

Entering a palace through the privy – Dennis Duncan (paraphrasing J. Swift), Index, A History of the: A Bookish Adventure from Medieval Manuscripts to the Digital Age, 2022.

This Index has been compiled to serve as a detailed navigational tool for readers seeking both established and lesser-known concepts, terms, and figures relevant to the study of political regimes, especially within the context of authoritarianism. It includes background information on a wide range of regimes – historical and contemporary – but does not provide entries for broad historical periods (such as the Renaissance, Enlightenment or the Cold War) in connection with specific regimes or countries. Instead, users should consult entries by country or regime name to locate information pertaining to those eras.

To guide readers faster to the most relevant information, pages numbers are formatted in bold, normal or cursive. Bold page numbers direct to the most important and comprehensive information; 'normal' typeset to relevant aspects, and cursive points to indirectly related topics.

Regimes These are indexed either by the name of their supreme power holder (dictator, monarch, president) or, in the case of collegial or party-based rule, by the acronym or name of the leading political party or ruling institution (e.g., FRELIMO, KANU, PRI, ZAPU, ...); especially if the focus is on the ruling institution itself, or a single clear leader is not identified for a regime.

Polities (countries and territories) These are included only when the respective page contains substantive information about their political history or authoritarian legacies. Other place names have routinely been omitted.

Names The index comprehensively covers authors and political thinkers up to 1950; after this date, only those whose works represent theoretical contributions (that are covered in detail) are included, to avoid overburdening the Index with less consequential references and to maintain its focus and usability. These editorial choices ensure that users can efficiently locate substantial and relevant information, while the structure of the Index reflects an emphasis on clarity, conciseness, and scholarly utility.

Concept Lesser-known concepts or 'would-be entries' that did not merit their own dedicated entry can be found in the Index. The same goes for theoretical frames adjacent to the study of authoritarianism and etymological/onomastic references.

1905 Revolution, 41
1905 war, 451
1984 (book), 46
9/11 attacks, 761, 897–898, 900, 902

A

A&F, 300
abdications, 595
aborted openings, 322 absolutism, 41, 130, 267, 429 bureaucratic, 431
  vs. sultanism, 210
absolutist bias
  monarchy, 122
  personalist rule, 170
Abu Bakr al-Baghdadi, 699
Abu Dhabi, 126
Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, 699 academic freedom, 705
Acton, John E.E. Dalberg, 237
Adalet ve Kalkınma Partisi (see AKP)
Adbuh, Muhammad, 468, 471
Adorno, Theodor, 36, 812
Adoula, Cyrille, 528
Aduluyadej, Blumibol, 131
aesymnetes, 67
Afghani (al-), Sayyid Jamal al-Din Asadabad, 468, 471 Afghanistan, 892
  drugs, 763
  warlords, 905, 906, 907
Aflek, Michel, 472
African National Congress (see ANC)
African Spring, 680 Agathocles of Syracuse, 240
age (of rulers), 793
Agrippina the Younger, 522–523
AI, 73, 111, 383
  and censorship, 46, 48 and cyber-warfare, 726 aid (foreign), 681
Aidid, Mohamed, 905
Akayev, Aidar A., 798
Akayev, Askar A., 798
  family, 59
Akihito, Tsugunomiya, 130
AKP, 194, 325, 705, 849
ALBA, 400, 688
Albania, 112, 225, 747, 763
Alexander II (Russia), 523
Alexander the Great, 430, 800, 832, 860
Alfonso X (of Castile), 798
Algeria, 783
  monarchy, 125
Ali, Muhamed (Egypt), 468
Aliyev, Ilham, 205, 680, 841
Aliyev, Rakhat M., 798
Allende, Salvador, 519
All-under-Heaven, 129, 457, 458 al-Qaeda, 83, 897, 902
al-Shabaab, 56, 471, 781
alternation rule, 273, 277, 278
Althusser, Louis, 94
Alvarez, Mike (see also DD Index)
Ambstcharisma, 50
American Revolution, 601, 607
Amin, Hafizullah, 522
Amin, Idi Dada Oume, 582, 673
amir/emir, 218
Amir, Yigal, 522 amnesty, 583
Amsthierarchie, 270
Anabaptists, 498
anarchism, 432, 507
ANC, 135, 280, 851
Anckar, Carsten, 300
Anderson, Ashley, 288
Andijan massacre, 83, 680
Andrade, Jaime de (see Franco, Francisco)
Andropov, Yury V., 458
Ang Mei (Cambodia), 128
Angola, 106, 140, 194, 489, 608, 797, 803, 849
Anocracy, 27
Anthony, Mark, 344
anthropocracy, 217
anti-party candidates, 878
antisemitism, 384, 454, 466, 486, 490 ant-trafficking, 708
aoratocracy, 305
Apartheid regime, 278, 280, 489
appanages, 64, 181
aqsaqal, 99
Aquinas (see Thomas Aquinas)
Arab exceptionalism, 138, 638
Arab League, 640
Arab Spring, 457, 635, 771 and monarchies, 125
  vs. color revolutions, 663
Arat, Zehra F. Kabasakal, 301
Archigos dataset, 526, 552, 579, 794
ARENA party, 874–875
Arendt, Hannah, 256, 275
  on dictatorship, 70
  on power, 176
  on totalitarianism, 221
  on tyranny, 239
Argentina, 333, 357, 420, 537, 804, 806, 836, 874 aristocracy, 28, 258 natural, 29
  and oligarchy, 148
Aristotle
  classification, 252, 258
  on aesymnetes, 67
  on aristocracy, 28
  on despotism, 64
  on oligarchy, 79, 148
  on timocracy, 219
  on tyranny, 237, 238, 241, 896
armed forces, 823, 860
  privatization, 866
  (see also military regimes)
Arms Trade Treaty (ATT), 710
arms trafficking, 706
Aron, Raymond, 250, 275
  on totalitarianism, 221
Arthashastra, 264
Artificial Intelligence (see AI) asabiyyah ('aṣabiyya), 124, 701
Asante (Ghana), 132
ASEAN, 641
Ashanti (see Asante)
Asharshilik, 746
Ashgabatization, 775
Ashoka, 494
Asian Tigers, 740
Assad (al-), Asma, 802
Assad (al-), Bashar, 189, 335, 418, 716, 795
  paramilitary, 872
Assad (al-), Hafez, 472

assassin, 523 assassination, 519
  terrorism, 783
  transnational, 412–413
Association of Southeast Asian Nations (see ASEAN) Atatürk (see Kemal, Ghazi Mustafa (Atatürk) Athens, 854
  democracy, 241, 352
  oligarchy, 148
  timocracy, 219
Atwood, Margaret, 223
auctoritas, 32, 254
audience costs, 409, 410, 721, 897
Augustine of Hippo, 260., 497, 525
Augustus (see Octavian (Gaius Octavius))
Australia, 43, 587, 659, 734
Autenticité, 106
autholitarian dictatorship, 225 authoritarian advantage, 196, 730, 732, 734, 738 authoritarian collaboration, 369, 395–396 authoritarian constitutionalism, 327–331 authoritarian control, 193, 284, 293, 315, 332, 354, 410, 621, 823, 842, 855 authoritarian data problem, 47 (see also information gathering) authoritarian diffusion, 643 authoritarian enclaves, 532, 842 authoritarian environmentalism (see environmentalism) authoritarian gravity centers, 122, 654, 674 authoritarian international, 652
Authoritarianism, 30, 290, 292 disguised, 69 durable, 609
  new, 34
  (see also Autocracy; closed regimes; competitive authoritarianism; Dictatorship; electoral authoritarianism) authoritarian learning, 646
authoritarian mentality, 31 authoritarian modeling (see authoritarian learning) Authoritarian personality, 35 authoritarian policing, 854 authoritarian power-sharing, 188, 315, 410, 423, 425, 842 authoritarian promotion, 650
authoritarian regionalism, 712
authoritarian spells, 316 Authority, 32, 254, 268
  royal, 120
  sacral, 120
Autocracy, 40, 288
autocratization, 321–326
autocrat (type of rule), 168
autogolpe, 67, 135, 162, 339, 380, 549–551, 809
Autokrator, 40
autolitäre Diktatur, 225
axis of evil, 240
Azerbaijan, 205, 680

B

Baʿath Party, 472
Bach, Daniel C., 137, 140
background (of rulers), 794
Bahrain, 43, 78, 335, 473, 641, 770
  monarchy, 126
Bakunin, Mikhail A., 507
Baldus de Ubaldis, 260
Balzac, Honoré de, 825
Bandaranaike, Sirimavo, 804
Bandit Theory, 550, 906
Bandung conference, 201
Bangladesh, 473–474, 560
Banna(h) (al-), Hassan, 470, 472
Bảo Đại (Nguyễn Phúc Vĩnh Thụy) (Vietnam), 128 bar fight theory, 718, 722
Barre, Mohammed Siad, 418, 781, 905
Bartolus of Saxoferrato, 239, 260, 261
Baturo, Alexander, 342
  on leader background, 795
  on personalist rule, 164, 166
bayʿah, 124
Bayesian Item Response Theory (IRT), 287, 302, 317
Bédié, Aimé Henri Konan, 83
BEEPS, 98, 204, 205, 214
Beetham, David, 110 Behemoth, vi
Béla III (Hungary), 64
Belarus, 735
Belgium, 832
Belt and Road Initiative (see BRI) Ben Ali, Zine El Abidine, 188
benefices, 152, 178
beneficium, 180 (see also benefices)
Benin (monarchy), 132, 133, 134, 621
Berdymkhamedov, Gurbanguly, 735
Beria, Lavrenty, 189, 833, 863
Bertelsmann (Transformation Index), 302
Bharatiya Janata Party (BJP), 514
Bhutan (monarchy), 130
Bhutto, Benazir, 523 bias (see also absolutist bias; gender bias; imperialist; orientalist; selection bias)
Biden, Joe, 157
Big Five traits, 815–816 big man, 163, 895, 904
Bingen, Hildegard von, 52
Bitar (al-), Salah ad-Din, 472
Black knights, 42
Black Lives Matter, 484, 488, 602 blackmail, 823, 837, 841
black PR, 99, 104
Blake, William, vi
Blanqui, Louis Auguste, 69
blat, 98, 99, 366
blood brothers, 860, 861
Blue Revolution, 679
BMR Index, 250, 279, 287
bodhisattva, 128, 494
Bodin, Jean
  classification, 264
  on aristocracy, 29
  on despotism, 266
  on tyranny, 525
Boix, Charles (see also BMR Index)
Bokassa, Jean-Bédel, 421, 735, 804 Boko Haram, 699, 890
Bolivarian Alliance for the Peoples of Our America (see ALBA)

Bolívar, Simón, 399
Bolkiah, Hassanal (Brunei), 130
Bollen, Kenneth A., 308–309, 312
Bolsonaro, Jair, 197, 347, 747, 749
Bonaparte, France Louis-Napoléon, 422
Bonaparte, Napoleon, 115, 548
charisma, 51
on ideology, 94
protection, 862
Bonapartism, 445
bondsmen, 152
Bongo, Omar, 461, 771 book burning, 459
Booth, John Wilkes, 523
bossism, 143, 904
Bossuet, Jacques-Bénigne, 430
bot armies, 78
Botswana, 202, 278, 732, 734
Bourdieu, Pierre, 47
Bourguiba, Habib, 125, 188
boyars, 209
boycotts, 299, 355, 361
Bozizé, François, 868
Bradbury, Ray, 223
Brandt, Willy, 800
Bratton, Michael, 138
Brave New World, 46
Brazil, 144, 347, 416, 747, 749, 838
Brezhnev, Leonid I., 378, 458, 800
BRI, 75, 196
bribery, 60, 213, 398, 708
BRICS, 200
Brinks, Daniel, 283
brokers, 58, 82, 136, 144–146, 166, 179, 200, 366
Brooker, Paul, 163
Brown, David, 81
Brownlee, Jason, 288
Brunei Darussalam
monarchy, 130
Brutus, Marcus Junius, 523, 524
Brzeziński, Zbigniew, 221, 256, 290, 388, 848
Buber, Martin, 27
Buddha, 493, 494
Buddhism, 493 engaged, 494
and monarchy, 129
Bueno de Mesquita, Bruce, 313
Bulldozer Revolution, 678 bureaucracy, 824
charismatic, 52
patrimonial, 152, 153 bureaucratic authoritarianism, 43, 115
Burke, Edmund, 29
Burkina Faso, 421, 529
Burma (see Myanmar)
Burundi, 134, 735
monarchy, 134
Bush, George H.W., 106, 717
Bush, George, W., 240
Bush war, 202
Business Environment and Enterprise Performance Survey (see BEEPS)
Butler, Judith, 48
Byrd, Harry Flood, 145
Byzantium, 220, 430, 497, 519
despotism, 64
succession, 613
theocracy, 497

C

cacique democracy, 145
caciquismo, 138, 143, 292
Caesarism, 70, 421
Caesar, Julius Gaius, 40, 69, 240, 374, 421, 523 caesaropapism, 41, 220
cakravartin, 128, 493
Caligula (Gaius Julius Caesar Augustus Germanicus), 861 caliphate, 468, 500, 697–698
caliphs, 270, 697, 698
callout culture, 112
Calvin, John, 218, 222, 498
Cambodia, 789
censorship, 76
monarchy, 128
party, 849
Cambronne, Luckner, 798
Cameroon, 597
Canaris, Wilhelm, 833 capacity gap, 778
CAR, 421, 735, 868
Carnation Revolution, 678
Cassariego, Mario, 875
Cassius Longinus, Gaius, 523
Castelo Branco, Humberto de Alencar, 416 Castro, Fidel, 510
charisma, 51
pets, 800
purges, 385
Catalonia, 434
Catherine II the Great (Russia), 65, 803
Catherine de Medici, 803
Catholic Church, 217–218, 259, 497 cats, 800
caudillismo, 138, 143, 292, 904
CCP, 846, 849
ideology, 72
vs. CPSU, 405
Ceauşescu, Nicolae, 539, 752
Cedar Revolution, 678
censorship, 46
medical, 734
(see also digital authoritarianism)
Center for Systemic Peace, 27, 310 Central African Republic (see CAR)
challengers, 313
Chama cha Mapinduzi (CCM), 423
Chamberlain, Neville, 270
charisma, 49
and dynasties, 80
gender, 802
gender bias, 155, 271
hereditary, 50, 80, 803, 804
and revolution, 608
charismatic rule, 49, 270
and gender, 52
Charles III (UK), 773
ChatGPT, 49
chauvinism, 512
Chávez, Hugo, 333, 356, 393, 399, 416, 534, 641, 733, 771
Chávismo (see Chávez, Hugo)
Chechnya, 409, 757
clans, 55, 56
Che Guevara, Ernesto, 510
Chehabi, Houchang, 209, 291

Cheibub, José Antonio (see also DD Index)
Cheka, 522, 834, 836, 863
Chernenko, Konstantin U., 458
Chiang Kai-shek, 743, 905
Chichibu, prince Yasuhito, 451 chiefs (African), 133, 891 childhood (of rulers), 38, 812 child soldiers, 155, 894
Chile, 747, 855
  earthquake, 729
China, 347–348, 372–373, 381, 382, 509, 758
  bureaucracy, 826
  censorship, 73, 74–75, 78, 705–706
  foreign policy, 641, 642
  gender policy, 752
  judiciary, 843
  legislature, 846 militia, 857
  monarchy, 129
  perfomance, 234
  secret police, 836
  soft power, 200
  term limits, 416
  warlords, 905–906
China Dream, 638, 749
Chinese Communist Party (see CCP)
Chinggis Khan, 51, 129
Christianity, 497–498 (see also Catholic Church; East Orthodox Church; Ethiopian Orthodox Church; Russian Orthodox Church)
Chun Doo-Hwan, 520
Churchill, Winston S., 270
Cicero, Marcus Tullius, 503, 524
  on despotism, 64
  on legitimacy, 108
  on regicide, 524
  on republicanism, 503
  on tyranny, 204
Cincinnatus, Lucius Quinctius, 67 city-states, 28, 129, 148, 263, 503 civilizing mission, 489, 541, 586, 589, 901 civil-military relations, 153, 155, 337, 533–534, 608, 658, 823, 866 civil rights movement, 455, 884, 885, 886 civil society, 800 clan mothers, 157
clan politics, 53, 98 and neo-patrimonialism, 138 and patronage, 366
clan-state, 205
Clarke, Killian, 288 class politics, 136, 147, 148, 151, 153, 155
  and gender, 753
Claudius, Tiberius (Caesar Augustus Germanicus), 522, 861
Cleomenes III (Sparta), 237
Cleon of Athens, 481
Cleopatra VII (Egypt), 803 client, 57–58, 159, 178, 365
clientelism, 57
closed regimes, 40, 89, 111, 285, 287, 353, 411 collective action, 885
Collor, Fernando, 878
Colombia, 873, 875, 892
  drugs, 763 colonialism
  Belgian, 134–135, 230, 528, 542
  British, 133, 542–544, 586, 589
  French, 133, 543
  gender policy, 756
  Japanese, 542–544, 586, 588, 660
  Portuguese, 542, 836
  Russian (see imperialism) Spanish, 542, 544
  types, 659–660 (see also direct rule; indirect rule) colonial legacies, 540
colonial states, 657
color revolutions, 662
Colpus Dataset, 553
Columbus, 374
Combating Terrorism Center, 526
comitatus, 860
Commodus (Lucius Aelius Aurelius), 219, 861 communism, 276, 436, 507
Communist Party of the Soviet Union (see CPSU)
Compaoré, Blaise, 418, 421, 524, 529, 680, 865 Comparative Constitutions Project (CCP) database, 330, 422 comparative politics
  on power, 176
  and regimes, 173–174
competence, 691
  inner circle, 188
competitive authoritarianism, 285, 288 confederate states (USA), 454 conflict, 715
Confucianism, 129, 494
Confucius (Kong Zi), 457, 458, 494
Congo Free State, 230
Congo (Kinshasa), 105, 528, 580, 850 development, 733
  warlords, 905
  (see also Mobutu, Joseph Sese Seko) conscription, 607
conservatism, 38
Constant, Benjamin, 253
Constantine I (Byzantium), 220, 861 constitutional hardball, 324, 333
Constitutionalism, 436 constitutions, 328, 330, 436
continuismo, 421
Contras, 872, 875
Contreras, Manuel, 833 control (authoritarian), 193, 284, 293, 315, 332, 354, 410, 621, 823, 842, 855 co-optation, 332
Coppedge, Michael, 302 (see also V-Dem) coronation, 50, 735, 773
coronelismo, 138, 144
corporatism, 437
corruption, 60, 212
Corruption Perception Index, 98, 214 cosmopolitanism
  royal, 128–129
counterbalancing, 335–336
counter-revolution, 602 Coup Agency and Mechanisms

(CAM) Dataset, 552 coup belts, 560 coup contagion, 560 coup d'état, 547–556 creeping, 550–551
electoral, 552
guardian coups, 549 palace coups, 550–551
parliamentary, 552
presidential, 550–551
reform coups, 549
royal, 550–551
smart, 552, 556
veto coups, 549
Coup D'état Project (CDP), 553 coup-proofing, 335
coups de chef, 551, 553, 612
coups de regime, 553, 612 coup traps, 560
courts (see judiciary)
COVID-19, 77, 200, 346–347, 649, 730, 881 trust, 235
CPSU, 194, 848
and clans, 55
vs.CCP, 445
Crete, 257 crime organized, 526, 706, 709–710, 764, 784, 831, 869, 874, 902
transnational, 706, 710, 897
Critical Race Theory (CRT), 486
Croatia, 381
crony capitalism, 144
cronyism, 143
Crooks, Thomas Matthew, 526 crown prince, 520, 524, 610 dilemma, 610
cuartelazo, 548
Cuba, 385
development, 732
gender policy, 752, 756
Cuban Revolution, 51, 385, 498, 510, 602, 606, 673 Cultural Revolution, 112, 373
curacas, 144
Cursus Honorum, 795
Cutright, Phillips, 305
cyber-warfare, 47, 723
Cypselid rulers of Corinth, 240
Cyrus the Younger, 64
Czechoslovakia, 194, 225, 508, 678, 808, 836, 855

D

Dahl, Robert, 253, 287, 303, 307
classification, 303
on democracy, 63
on power, 175, 176
Dahomey, 132, 133, 134, 621
Dalai Lama, 129, 800
Dark Triad, 810, 817, 818
Datu, 127
D'Aubuisson, Roberto, 875
Davao Death Squad (see DDS)
Davidson, Christopher, M., 208
DD Index, 250, 277, 279, 287
DDS, 873, 874
deadweight loss, 402
death (of rulers), 158, 576, 581
de-ba'athification, 392
dedazo, 99, 100
defections, 167, 336, 597
delegative democracy, 34 demagogues, 255, 258, 481, 879 democide, 229
Democracy, 62, 258
with adjectives, 85, 281 assistance, 675
defective, 86
delegative, 89 embedded, 88 exclusive, 89
hollowing, 324
minimalist, 62, 273, 274, 278, 283, 308
oligarchic, 292
semi-, 85–86, 87, 151, 281, 283, 299
support, 675
transitional, 85, 87, 563, 887
tutelary, 89
Democracy-Dictatorship Index (see DD Index) Democracy Index, 98, 302 democracy promotion, 668
Democracy Score (see Freedom House) democraduras, 86
democratic backsliding (see autocratization) democratic consolidation, 322, 561
democraticness, 301, 302
and trust, 235
Democratic Party (USA), 157 democratic peace theory, 687, 715, 716 democratic policing, 837, 854 democratic recession (see autocratization) democratization, 322, 565
Deng Xiaoping, 401, 405, 416
Denim Revolution, 679
Denmark, 755
Deobandism, 473–474
de-oligarchization, 149
Department of Government Efficiency (DOGE), 150 dependency theory, 139, 643 de-personalization, 149, 166, 378, 628 depolitization, 95
depositions, 595
desaparecidos, 420, 837
desertions, 597
designation, 613
despot, 163 (see also despotism) despotes, 64
despotic privilege, 65
Despotism, 63
despotism
nuclear, 765
and tyranny, 237
vs. sultanism, 210
despotissa, 64
de-Stalinization, 372, 401, 511
Destutt de Tracy, Antoine Louis Claude, 94
Devarāja, 128
development, 738
model
China, 743
East Asian, 742
Hong Kong, 743
Japan, 742
Singapore, 744
South Korea, 743
Taiwan, 743

Devşirme, 861
Dharma, 264, 265, 492, 494
Dharmaraja, 493
Diamond, Jared, 103
Diamond, Larry, 86, 281, 882
dictablandas, 86
dictatorial peace, 715
Dictatorship, 68, 290
  elected, 67, 258
  of the Proletariat, 71
  (see also Authoritarianism; Autocracy) dictatura, 69
Diem, Dinh Ngo, 67, 519
digital activism, 887 digital authoritarianism, 72 (see also censorship) Dionysius of Syracuse, 240 direct rule, 133–134, 157, 274, 542, 659 disaster management, 727 disease management, 730
disguised authoritarianism, 69
Disinformation, 341
Disini, Herminio, 59
dittature d'ordine (Sartori), 70
Doe, Samuel, 905
DOGE, Department of Government Efficiency, 150 dogmatism, 38
dominant parties, 195, 297, 850
Domination, 268
Dominican Republic, 59, 684
domino effect, 643
dominus, 64
Domitien, Elisabeth, 804 dos Santos, Isabel, 797
dos Santos, José Eduardo, 849 doublespeak, 825 dowager, 620, 802
doxing, 112
DRC (see Congo (Kingshasa)) drones, 726
Dubaization, 775
Dubček, Alexander, 508
Duma, 41
Dunant, Henry, 883
Durkheim, Émile, 268, 994
Dutch disease, 184, 186
Duterte, Rodrigo, 324, 581, 582, 799
  death squads, 875
Duterte, Sara, 799
Duvalier
  François 'Papa Doc', 795
  Jean-Claude 'Baby Doc', 798
  regime, 103, 875
Duverger, Maurice, 249, 884
dynasticism, 79–80, 166 dynasties, 79, 120, 611
  Chakri, 130
  Gojoseon, 130
  Goryeo (Koryŏ), 130
  Gtsang, 129
  Joseon (Chosŏn), 130, 189
  Ming, 129, 499
  Phagmodrupa, 129
  Qin, 129, 458
  Qing, 129, 299, 499
  Sakya, 129
  Shah, 130
  Tang, 129, 499, 803
  Wangchuk, 130
  Xia, 129
  Yarlung, 129
  Zagwe, 180

E

EAEU, 354, 713
Earl, Jennifer, 406–407
East Asian Tigers, 740
Eastern Orthodox Church, 497–498
Ebola, 735
echo chambers, 48
Economic Community of West African States (see ECOWAS) ECOWAS, 710, 713 education, 747 ego, 38
Egypt, 332, 470, 533, 757, 758
  censorship, 76
  monarchy, 125, 189
Eisenhower, Dwight D., 643
Eisenstadt, Shmuel N., 137, 163, 825 ejectorate, 314
elders, 157, 451
  councils of, 134
  (see also gerontocracy) election observers, 361 elections, 353
  local, 354
electoral authoritarianism, 86, 284, 352
electoralism, 88, 273
elite pacts, 572
elites, 308
  cohesion, 354 communist clans, 55 competition, 131
  and Fascism, 447
  incompetence, 112
  local, 354
  and populism, 480 promotions, 131
  purges, 385
Elizabeth I (UK), 803
Elkink, Johan A., 342
El Salvador, 874–875
embezzlement, 60, 104
Emerson, Ralph Waldo, 906
éminence grise, 305, 615 (see also regents) emir/amir, 218
Emperor, 40
emulation (see authoritarian learning)
Engelbert of Admont, 261
Engels, Friedrich
  on ideology, 94
English Revolution, 785
English School (Theory), 713
Enlai, Zhou, 401
enlightened despotism, 65 (see also Despotism) environmentalism, 748
Episodes of Regime Transformation (ERT) Dataset, 629
Equatorial Guinea, 733
Erbscharisma, 50
Erdoğan, Recep, 325, 756
  party, 194
Eritrea, 224
Estado Novo (Portugal), 34, 857
Estonia, 725
Eswatini, 132, 134, 135
  patrimonialism, 155
ETA, 851

Ethiopia (monarchy), 134, 180
Ethiopian Orthodox Church, 134, 497
Ethiopian Revolution, 134 ethnic politics, 81, 904 ethnic stacking, 82, 335, 338, 388, 716 and nepotism, 60
ethnos, 465
ethnosymbolism, 465
eugenics, 454
Eurasian Economic Union (see EAEU)
Eurasianism, 638
Euromaidan, 679
Euskal Herritarok (see ETA) executive aggrandizement, 162 executives, 829 exile, 577, 579, 629
exit options, 576

F

failed states, 776
fake news, 74, 345 (see also disinformation) false consciousness, 96
family
  presidential, 55
  of rulers, 796
  (see also dynasties)
famine, 715, 734, 740, 750
fanaticism, 91
Faoro, Raymundo, 155
Farabi (al-), Abu Nasir, 148, 500, 701
FARC, 875, 892
Fascism, 443
  diffusion, 645
  Italian, 438
  Japanese, 450
  Nazism, 443, 448
  neo-, 448, 455
  and totalitarianism, 446
  Ur-, 446–447
fate (of rulers), 576, 628, 718
Fa tradition (see Legalism)
FBI, 833
Fedayeen Saddam, 872, 878
Federal Bureau of Investigation (see FBI) female rulers, 801
Ferdinand II (of Aragon), 806
feudalism, 40, 180, 431
  and patrimonialism, 153 and prebendalism, 178
feudum/feodum, 180
Fidesz, 321, 324, 325, 356
fiefs, 64, 152, 180 fighting for survival, 683 filibuster, 333
filter bubbles, 48
Finer, Samuel E., 44, 823
firewall (China), 75 flooding, 48, 72, 75, 78 flower revolutions, 677 (see also color revolutions)
Floyd, George, 596
Foquismo, 606
foreclosure (censorship), 48 foreign aid, 681
foreign invasion, 683
foreign occupation, 288, 294, 296, 671
foreign policy, 686
foreign policy analysis (see FPA)
Forest, Nathan Bedford, 454
Foucault, Michel, 487, 589, 661
  on censorship, 46, 47–48
Foundations of Rebel Group Emergence (FORGE) Dataset, 892 FPA on conflict, 717
  on regime promotions, 394
  on soft power, 199
Fragile State Index, 98, 310, 778, 779, 826 fragile states, 776
Franco, Francisco, 375, 855
Frantz, Erica, 294
  on personalist rule, 163
  (see also GWF)
Franz-Ferdinand (Archduke of Austria), 523 fraud, 60, 355–356
Frederick II (Prussia), 65, 825
Fredriksson, Cecilia, 300
Freeden, Michael, 93, 95, 96
Freedom House, 249, 284, 287, 301, 311–312
Freedom Rating (see Freedom House) free speech, 46, 47, 48, 74, 331, 451 (see also media freedom)
FRELIMO, 194, 851
French Revolution, 112, 154, 601, 785, 898
Frente de Libertação de Moçambique (see FRELIMO) friction, 48, 72
Friedrich, Carl Joachim, 256, 290, 484
  on totalitarianism, 221
friendship (instrumental), 57
Fromm, Erich, 36, 812, 818
FSB, 836, 837
Fučík, Julius, 223
Führer (see Hitler, Adolf)
Führerdiktatur, 224
Fujimori, Alberto, 850, 878, 879
Fukuyama, Francis, 93, 95, 461, 463, 567, 673 fundamentalism, 902
  Islamic, 224, 467, 468, 475, 698
  Judaism, 497

G

Gabirol, Solomon ibn, 496
Gabon, 771
Galíndez (Suárez), Jesús de, 208 gambling for survival, 683
Game-of-chairs, 335, 388
Gamsakhurdia, Zviad, 556
Gandhi, Indira, 523, 805
Gandhi, Jennifer (see also DD Index)
Gandhi, Mahatma
  charisma, 50
Garibaldi, Giuseppe, 69, 375
Gasiorowski, Mark J., 250, 282
gatekeeping, 83, 113
Gbadolite, 106
Gbagbo, Laurent
  gatekeeping, 83–84
GCC, 125, 641, 714
Geddes, Barbara, 294
  classification, 117
  hoarding, 360
  on personalist rule, 163, 163,

239 on single-party regimes, 192
(see also GWF)
gender bias, 802
monarchy, 122
Weber, 155, 271
gender equality, 751
gender policy (see also LGBTQ plus) genocide, 229, 528
Genossen, 136, 153, 163, 207
Genossenrecht, 207
Gentile, Giovanni, 222
George, Henry, 402
Germany, 71, 369, 392, 466, 586, 638, 855
East
police, 407, 854
secret police, 833, 836
sports, 774
West, 638, 831
(see also Nazi Germany)
gerontocracy, 152, 153, 157, 231, 270
Gerousia, 157
Gerring, John, 302 (see also V-Dem)
Gerry, Elbridge, 356
Gerrymandering, 321, 356, 809
Gerschewski, Johannes, 333, 408
on ideology, 95
on legitimacy, 109
Gestapo, 813, 831, 835, 836
Ghana, 399, 408
monarchy, 132
Ghazali (al-), 501, 698
Gilbert, Gustave M., 812, 820
Giles of Rome, 261
Gilets Jaunes, 112
Giscard d'Estaing, Valéry, 106, 588
Gizenga, Antoine, 530
glasnost, 372, 404
Global Assassination Monitor, 526
Glorious Revolution, 41
Goebbels, Magda, 805 Golkar, 849
golpe de estado (see coup d'état)
Gorbachev, Michail S., 372, 404, 800
Gotha Programme, 71
Gouges, Olympe de, 752
Gournay, Marie de, 752
Gournay, Vincent de, 825 government, 173
graft, 61
Gramsci, Antonio
on censorship, 47
on hegemony, 94
on revolution, 604
Grauvogel, Julia legitimization, 109, 110
Great Co-Prosperity, 451, 452 Great Depression, 36
Greece, 534
oligarchy, 148
secret police, 838
Green Movement, 679
green politics, 748
guanxi, 99
Guardianship Dilemma, 824 guards palace (see Praetorians)
presidential, 860
Swiss, 862
Guatemala, 875
Guinea, 735
Guinea-Bissau, 763 Guizot, François
on democracy, 252, 254
on legitimacy, 108
GULAG, 225–226, 372
Gulf Cooperation Council (see GCC)
Gulf monarchies, 124, 769–770
Gulf War, 717, 812, 878
Gupta family (South Africa), 205
Gurr, Ted R., 27, 301, 309
GWF, 117, 163, 249, 287, 294

H

H&T, 249, 287, 296, 298
Habermas, Jürgen, 881
on censorship, 46
Habyarimana, Juvenal, 524
Hadenius, Axel, 296 (see also H&T)
Hadith, 159, 500
Haile Selassie (Tafari Makonnen), 134
Haiti, 151, 798, 875
development, 732
earthquake, 729
Haitian Revolution, 601
Hale, Henry, 159
Haller, Karl Ludwig von, 154
Hamas, 470, 851
Hamitic myth, 134
Hammarskjöld, Dag, 528
Hanafi Islam, 698
Hanbali Islam, 53, 698
Han Fei, 456, 458
Hanif, Mohammed, 519
Hannibal, 832
Harberger triangle, 402
hard power, 198
Harems, 619–622
Harris, Kamala, 157
hashtag poisoning, 78
Haudenosaunee Confederacy, 157
Havel, Václav, 54, 225
on tyranny, 239
Haycock, Dean A., 820
healthcare, 580, 731–743, 889 health (of rulers), 793
Hegel, Friedrich, 880 hegemonic parties, 195, 849
hegemony, 303, 397
Gramsci, 47, 94
Heidegger, Martin, 255
Heller, Joseph, 825
Henry VIII, 220
Herat, 907
Herling-Grudziński, Gustaw, 223
Herodotus, 64
Herrschaft, 32, 136, 160, 256, 268–269
Herzog, Yitzhak HaLevi, 497
Hesiod, 257
Hezbollah, 473, 725, 851
Hichilema, Hakainde, 850
hierocracy, 217
Hiero of Syracuse, 64

Himmler, Heinrich, 813, 834, 855, 862
Hinduism, 492
hirak, 635, 636
Hirohito, emperor, 450 (see also Shōwa regime)
Hiroshima, 453
Hitler, Adolf, 68
  body, 582
  books, 227, 374
  charisma, 50, 52, 481
  childhood, 811
  control, 131
  cult, 369
  Führer, 50, 52, 448, 467
  inner circle, 805, 812
  party, 193, 466
  psychology, 811
  soft power, 199
Hitlerjugend, 877
HIV/AIDS, 733, 736
Hobbes, Thomas, vi
  on aristocracy, 29
  on power, 175
  on sovereignty, 430
  on state of nature, 432
  on tyranny, 239
Ho Chi Minh, 581
  books, 227–228
Holocaust, 229, 466
Holodomor, 746
Holofernes (Assyria), 524 homosexuality (see LGBTQ plus) Honduras, 533
Hong Kong, 705
Hong Kong protests, 596, 679, 886 horses, 800
Hoxha, Enver, 225, 507–508
Huángdì, 129
Human Intelligence, 834 human rights, 758
HUMINT, 834
Hungary, 324, 325–326, 356, 373, 705
  gender policy, 756
  indoctrination, 747
  party, 849
  secret police, 835, 838
Huntington, Samuel P., 33, 567, 882 on armed forces, 823
  on personalist rule, 163
  (see also waves of democracy & autocracy)
Husri (al-) Sati, 468
Hutu, 106, 134–135, 551
Huxley, Aldous, 46
hybrid regimes, 85, 281
  and Authoritarianism, 34
  vs. democracy, 63

I

IAEA, 765, 766
ICC, 324, 411, 578, 894–895
Idealism
  on power, 176
ideocracy, 91, 223, 298
Ideological State Apparatuses, 94
ideology, 92, 608
  utopian, 91, 623
  writings, 227
Idris I (Libya), 125
Ikhwanism, 469–470
Ikki Kita, 452
illiberal democracy, 34, 89 illiberal solidarism, 34 immunity death squads, 873
  elites, 392, 533, 578, 626, 809
Imperator, 40
imperial gaze, 753
imperial history, 585
imperialism, 584–585
  British, 586
  French, 588
  Japanese, 586
  Russian, 586, 588
  USA, 589
imperialist bias, 122 imperial turn, 589
impersonal charisma, 51
incompetence, 112
incumbency advantage, 809
  during succession, 615 in dynasties, 80
incumbents, 807
Index of Democratization (see also Vanhanen Index)
Index of Forbidden Books, 263, 459
Index of personalism, 379
Index of Political Development, 305–306
India
  British rule, 130
  earthquake, 729
  Islam, 473–474
  monarchy, 130, 180
  nationalism, 514
  Vedic state, 493
indirect rule, 129, 133, 542, 659
indoctrination, 193, 337, 362
Indonesia, 834
informality, 97, 164, 173, 174, 245–246, 613 informal rules (see informality) informants, 417
information-gathering, 167, 354, 648, 690, 716, 739, 749, 844
inner circle, 187
  captive court, 794
inquisition, 218, 417
institutionalism, 98 (see also new institutionalism)
Institutional Revolutionary Party (see PRI) institutions informal, 174, 282
  and resource curse, 185
  subversive, 99
insurgent groups (see also rebel regime; terrorist groups) intelligence services, 830
International Atomic Energy Agency (see IAEA) International Criminal Court (see ICC) international regimes, 173
International Relations (see IR) interregnums, 310, 610
intersectionality, 487 intimidation, 355 effect, 849
Inukai Tsuyoshi, 519 IR on anarchy, 432
  on power, 174–175, 176, 199
  on regime promotion, 393

and regimes, 173
IRA, 783, 850
Iran, 295, 296, 348, 357, 768
censorship, 706
cyber-warfare, 725
ideology, 92, 218, 473
stability, 594
Iraq, 473 nuclear weapons, 766
paramilitary, 872
(see also Saddam Hussein Abd al-Majid al-Tikriti)
Irish Republican Army (see IRA)
Irish Republican Brotherhood (see IRA)
Iroquois, 157
Isabel I (of Castile), 803, 806
ISIL, 459, 697, 699, 783, 892, 899
ISIS (see ISIL)
Islam, 218, 500
-ic brotherhood, 470
-ic States, 697
jurisprudence, 159 political, 467
succession, 500
worldview, 698
Islambouli, Khalid, 523
Islamic Revolution, 768, 785
Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (see ISIL)
Ismailovsky regiment, 803
Ivan III (Russia), 209
Ivan IV the Terrible (Russia), 41, 220, 863
Ivory Coast, 83–84
Jackson, Robert H., 163, 168
Jacobin rule (France), 112, 222
jacqueries, 144
Jamaatism, 474
Janissaries, 115, 619, 861–862

J

Japan, 450, 838
Fascism, 450
feudalism, 180
monarchy, 129–130
Japan-Russian War, 451
Jasmine Revolution, 679
Jeanne d'Arc, 52
Jiang Qing, 802, 806
jihad, 698
jingoism, 512
Joan of Arc (see Jeanne d'Arc)
Johnson, Lydon B., 684
Jonathan, Leabua, 135
Jordan, 768
armed forces, 124
monarchy, 125, 126, 189
Joseph, Richard, 178–179
Juche, 202, 373, 509
Judaism, 218, 496–497
Judas (Iscariot), 524
judiciary, 842
independence, 285
Judith (bible), 524
Junta, 101, 117 (see also coup d'état; military regimes)
Junzi, 495
Justice and Development Party (see AKP)
Justinian I (Byzantium), 220

K

Kabila, Joseph, 530
Kabila, Laurent-Désiré, 106
Kaczyński, Jarosław, 848 (see also PiS)
Kadi justice, 195, 208
Kadyrov, Ramzan, 56, 757, 876
Kafando, Michel, 865
Kafka, Franz, 825
Kagame, Paul, 356, 524, 736, 753
Kailitz, Steffen, 298
classification, 249, 298
on legitimacy, 110
Kaisar/Kaiser, 40
kakistocracy, 112
Kamenev, Lev B. (Rosenfeld), 387 kangaroo courts, 842
KANU, 849
Kaplan, Fanny (Feiga Haimovna Roytblat), 522
Karimova, Gulnara I., 59, 799
Karimov, Islam A., 680
family, 59, 799
gatekeeping, 83
Karmal, Babrak, 522
Karzai, Hamid, 907
Kasavubu, Joesph, 528
Katanga, 105, 489, 528
Kautilya (Chanakya/Vishnu-gupta), 264, 494, 526
Kautsky, Karl, 71
Kazakhstan, 416, 826
corruption, 59
famine, 746
rentierism, 771
Kazi (see Kadi justice)
KBG, 56, 344, 836, 837, 838
Kebra Negast, 134
Keita, Modibo, 530
Kemal, Ghazi Mustafa (Atatürk), 374, 705
Kennedy, John F., 145
Kenya, 82, 140, 157, 423, 756, 783
Kenyan National African Union (see KANU) Kenyatta, Jomo, 140, 530
Kérékou, Mathieu, 529
Khaldûn, Ibn, 501, 701–702
Khan, Imran, 879
Khan, Ismael, 907
Khmara, 55
Khomeini, Sayyid Ruhollah Musavi, Ayatollah, 92, 471, 699
books, 228
Khomeinism, 471–472, 473
Khrushchev, Nikita S., 401 age, 458
pets, 800
secret speech, 368, 372
Kimba, Évariste, 105
Kim Il-Sung, 509
books, 374
charisma, 51
cult, 370
de-Stalinization, 373
Kim Jae-Gyu, 523
Kim Jong-Il
cult, 370
ideology, 202
inner circle, 188
Kim Jong-Nam, 523
Kim Jong-Un, 523, 735, 848
Kim Pyong-Il, 797
King, Martin Luther Jr., 886

kingship, 237
kinship, 53, 80, 366, 701
Kipling, Rudyard, 541
KKK, 449, 454
kleptocracy, 102
kōban, 854
kompromat, 99, 837, 841
Komsomol, 747, 877
Kony, Joseph, 904
Korea
  monarchy, 130
  (see also North Korea; South Korea)
Korean War, 201
Kosovo, 719
Kosygin, Alexei N., 401
kremlin, 342
kremlinology, 342
Ku Klux Klan (see KKK)
Kuomintang, 357, 401, 743
Kuwait, 767
  monarchy, 126
Kwantung Army, 452
Kyoto School of Geopolitics, 130, 451
Kyrgyzstan, 826
  clans, 54
  rentierism, 771

L

L&W, 249, 250, 285
labor unions, 434, 738, 879, 885
Lakan, 127
La Mare, Nicolas de, 854
lame ducks, 425, 793
Lamizana, Sangoulé, 378, 380
Langer, Walter, C., 811
Lao Zi, 432
latent measure of personalism (LMP), 164, 166, 378
Law and Justice Party (see PiS) Law Enforcement Agencies intelligence, 803
  police, 853
leader fates, 576
League of Nations, 452
Lebanon, 473
  drugs, 763
Lebensraum, 448, 467
Lee Kuan Yew, 410, 744 left-wing authoriarianism, 37, 38, 299, 477, 480, 874 legacies
  authoritarian, 533
  colonial, 540
  imperial, 584–589
  military rule, 534
  personalist, 532, 544
  revolutionary, 607
  totalitarian, 622
Legalism, 456
legal-rational rule, 270, 614
legionnaires, 866 legislatures, 844
legitimacy, 107
  domestic, 107
  elections, 354
  external, 107, 676 gap, 778 institutional-charismatic, 51 micro-, 108
  Weber, 269
legitimation, 107
  strategies, 109
legitimization (see legitimation)
Lemkin, Raphael, 229
Lenin, Vladimir I., 343 assassination attempt, 522
  bodyguard, 581
  books, 227
  ideology, 508
  on dictatorship, 71
  on revolution, 604
  pets, 800
  protection, 863
Leo, Heinrich, 91
Leopold II (Belgium), 230
Lesotho, 134, 135, 296
leverage (see Linkage & Leverage Theory) Leviathan, vi
Levitsky, Steven, 86, 281, 285, 395 (see also L&W)
LGBTQ plus, 326, 755 liberalization
  vs. democratization, 86
Liberation Theology, 498, 499
Libya, 296, 470, 529
  arms trafficking, 709
  monarchy, 125
Lijphart, Arend, 317
Like-Minded Group (LMG), 641
Limongi, Fernando (see also DD Index)
Lincoln, Abraham, 523
Lindberg, Staffan I., 302 (see also V-Dem)
Linkage & Leverage Theory, 113, 395, 396
Linmark, R. Zamora, 581
Linz, Juan José Storch de Gracia, 253
  classification, 32, 86, 291
  neo-sultanism, 207
  on Authoritarianism, 30
  on legitimacy, 109
  on totalitarianism, 221, 224
lions, 134, 800
Lipset, Seymour Martin, 250, 276, 305–306
  on ideology, 95
Li Si, 456, 458
Litvinenko, Alexander, 837
LMP, 164, 166, 378
lobbying, 54, 182, 305, 395, 398, 403, 749, 881
Locke, John, 701, 881, 901
  on despotism, 266
  on state of nature, 432, 433
  on tyranny, 525
London, Jack, 223
lone wolves, 522, 897
longevity (of rulers), 158, 591 (see also tenure) Lon Nol, 67
looting, 336, 597, 890, 905
Louis XIV (France), 336 loyalty, 57, 108, 131, 163, 293, 335, 337, 444, 495, 691, 797
  inner circle, 188, 189
Ludwig, Arnold M., 813
Lukashenko, Alexander, 653, 735
Lumumba, Patrice, 105, 489, 524, 528–530
Lungu, Edgar, 850
lustration, 389, 392, 583, 838
Luther, Martin, 498

M

McCarthyism, 479
MacDonald, John M., 817
Machiavellianism, 818
Machiavelli, Niccolò, 265
  classification, 263
  on aristocracy, 29
  on tyranny, 237, 238
Macht, 269
Macías Nguema, Francisco, 103, 733
Madagascar, 356
Maduro, Nicolás, 51, 400, 642, 733, 771
MAGA, 39
Maha Bhumibol Adulyadej (Rama IX), 131
mahallas, 55
Maharajah, 130
Maha Vajiralongkorn (Rama X), 131
Mahendra Bir Bikram Shah Dev (Nepal), 130
Mahmud II (Ottomans), 862
Maimonides, Moses, 496
Maïnassara, Ibrahim Baré, 863
Mainwaring, Scott, 283
majestas/maiestas, 165, 264, 524
Ma Jian, 833
Make America Great Again! (see MAGA)
Makhno, Nestor I., 434
Malaysia
  monarchy, 128
  protection pact, 67
Malcolm X, 886
Mali, 861
malik, 124
Maliki (al-), Nouri Kamil Muhammad-Hasan, 338 malinformation, 345–346
Malthus, Thomas, 402
Mamluks, 862
Manchukuo, 453, 763
Manchuria (see Manchukuo) Mandala Theory, 265
mandarins, 499
mandate of heaven, 128
Mandela, Nelson Rolihlahla, 111, 489, 851, 886 statue, 202
mandonismo, 138, 144
Mannheim, Karl, 94
manoralism, 180
Mansor, Rosmah, 806
Mansudae Art Studio, 201–202
Manu (Svayambhuva), 492
Maoism, 227, 228, 509–510
Mao Zedong, 382, 416
  books, 227–228, 375
  cult, 370
  de-Stalinization, 373
  on dictatorship, 72
  on Shang Yang, 458
  personalization, 289
marches (protest), 597
Marcos, Ferdinand, 103, 416, 421
  body, 581, 582
  family, 59
  paramilitary, 875
Marcos, Ferdinand 'Bongbong' Jr., 799
Marcos, Imelda, 797, 802
Margrethe II (Denmark), 121
Mariana, Juan de, 525 marriage and clans, 53 politics, 189
  same-sex, 755
Marshall, Monty G., 27, 310
Marsilius of Padua, 262
Marxism, 276, 382, 394, 397, 401, 508
  and corporatism, 437
  ecological, 748
  and Fascism, 446, 447
  and modernization theory, 460, 461 scientific, 509
Marx, Karl, 71, 508, 604
  on ideology, 94
Mary II (UK), 806
Masaryk, Tomáš Garrigue, 54 mask diplomacy, 200
Mawardi (al-), 501, 698, 701
Mawdudi (al-), Sayyid Abu al-Ala, 474, 698–699
Mazzini, Guiseppe, 252, 254 media (see also social media) media freedom, 74, 286, 358, 361, 401, 670, 807 (see also free speech) media laws, 49, 72 media (traditional), 145, 255, 326, 356, 376, 381–382, 448, 537–538, 641, 651, 652–654, 664, 735, 756 (see also social media)
Medici, 263, 803
Medvedev, Dmitry A., 829
Meiji restoration, 130
  revolution, 450
Meiji, emperor Mutsuhito, 374, 450
Meir, Golda, 804
Mencius, 457, 495
Mengistu Haile Mariam, 629
Meng Zi (see Mencius)
Mensheviks, 508
mercenaries, 866
meritocracy, 131
Merkel, Wolfgang, 88
  on Authoritarianism, 33
  on totalitarianism, 224
mestnichestvo, 209
Mexico, 144, 354, 435, 724
  drugs, 763
  earthquake, 728, 729
  term limits, 416
Michels, Robert, 149, 573, 574, 884
Micius, 457
Micombero, Michel, 135 micro-legitimacy, 108
microtargeting, 48
Mielke, Erich, 833
military regimes, 115, 294 (see also armed forces; Praetorians)
Miller, Michael (see also BMR Index)
Milton, John, 525
Ministeriale, 136
mirrors for princes, 263, 798 misinformation, 345–346 missionaries, 543
Mitteleuropa, 586
mixed systems (see semi-presidential systems) Mnangagwa, Emmerson, 806

mob rule, 112
Mobutu, Joseph Sese Seko, 103, 105, 116, 411, 528, 530
  cult, 370
  party, 850
  protection, 862
modernization and corruption, 58, 136
  and democracy, 276, 277, 306, 566–567, 569, 672 and Islam, 475
  and revolution, 603
  theory, 460, 465, 569, 570, 652
  and totalitarianism, 222
  and Weber, 269, 270 (see also professionalization)
modernization theory, 44
Modi, Narendra Damodardas, 514
Mogadishu Line, 418
Mohéli, Jumbe Fatimah (Comoro Islands), 128
monarchy, 120, 294
  and Arab Spring, 125
  Arab world, 123
  constitutional, 128, 300
  Indo-Pacific, 127
  nuclear, 765
  parliamentary, 120
  presidential, 164
  semi-, 300
  Sub Saharan Africa, 132
  vs. personalist rule, 164–165
Mongolia, 129, 680
monism, 223, 493, 507
monocrat, 163
monopolies, 180, 402
Montesqueiu, Charles-Louis de Secondat, 253, 901
  classification, 267
  on aristocracy, 29
  on despotism, 65
Morgenthau, Hans, 174
Morocco
  armed forces, 124
  monarchy, 125, 126
Morozov, Pavel T., 417
Morrow, James D., 313
Mosca, Gaetano, 573
Moshoeshoe I (Lesotho), 135
Moshoeshoe II (Lesotho), 135
Mouvement Populaire de la Révolution (see MPR)
Movimento Popular de Libertação de Angola (see MPLA)
Mozambique, 192, 194, 422, 489, 608, 851
Mozambique Liberation Front (see FRELIMO)
Mo Zi (see Micius)
MPLA, 194, 849
MPR, 848, 850
Mubarak, Hosni, 332
Mugabe, Grace, 806
Mugabe, Robert Gabriel, 202, 356, 357, 582, 756, 806
Muggeridge, Malcolm, 838
Mughals, 130, 180
Muhammad VIII al-Amin Bey (Tunisia), 125
Mulele, Pierre, 105
Murillo, Rosario, 806
Museveni, Yoweri, 736 musical chairs, 335, 388
Musk, Elon, 149
Mussolini, Benito, 222, 275, 444, 448
  body, 582
  books, 375
  charisma, 481
  legacy, 535
  party, 193
  secret police, 833
Mussolini, Edda, 797
Mustafa IV (Ottomans), 862
mutinies, 338, 547, 597
Mutsuhito (see Meiji)
Mwinyi, Ali Hassan, 423
Myanmar, 533, 560, 829 cyclone, 728
  drugs, 763

N

Nagasaki, 453
Naguib, Muhammad, 125
Nahyan (al-), Mohammed bin Zayed, 126
Namibia, 202, 203, 535
naming-and-shaming, 412, 554, 578, 759, 789 NAND, 281, 288
Napoleon III (France), 422
Napoleon Bonaparte (Napoleone di Buonaparte) (see Bonaparte) narcissism, 817–818
narco-states, 762
narodniki, 478
Naruhito, Hironomiya, 130
Narutowicz, Gabriel, 522
Nasionale Party, 489
Nasser, Gamal Abdel, 125, 510 nationalism, 465
  banal, 774
  (see also ultra-nationalism)
National Union (Portugal) (see Salazar, António de Oliveira) nation-state, 121, 231, 251, 429, 447, 465–468, 488, 496, 584, 854
Nazarbayev, Nursultan A., 416, 627
  family, 59, 798
Nazerbayeva, Aliya N., 798
Nazerbayeva, Dariga N., 798
Nazi Germany, 381, 448, 812
  performance, 131
  police, 855, 857
  secret police, 831, 835
Nazism, 466
Ndlovukati, 133, 135
Négritude, 106
Nehru, Jawaharlal, 50
Neo Destour, 125
neo-Nazism, 449, 455 neo-patrimonialism, 136
neo-sultanism, 207, 292 (see also sultanism) Nepal (monarchy), 130
nepotism, 59, 80
Nero, Claudius (Caesar Augustus Germanicus), 523 Netanyahu, Benjamin, 111 networks clan, 55
  patronal, 612
Neumann, Sigmund, 221
New Censorship Theory, 46, 47
new institutionalism, 98, 163, 567–568

New State (Portugal) (see Estado Novo) NGOs, 646, 647, 880
  environmental, 749
Ngwenyama, 135
Nicaragua, 357, 806, 872, 875
  earthquake, 728
Nicole Oresme, 262, 525
Niewiadomski, Eligiusz, 522
Niger, 863
Nigeria, 178, 397, 732
  rentierism, 771
Nixon, Richard, 401, 763 Niyazov, Saparmurat (Türkmenbaşy), 735–736
  books, 228, 375
  cult, 369
Nizam al-Mulk (Abu Ali Hasan ibn Ali Tusi), 501 Nkomo, Joshua Mqabuko Nyongolo, 202–203
Nkrumah, Kwame, 133, 528, 530, 585
Nkurunziza, Pierre, 735
NKVD, 384, 522, 835, 836, 837, 863, 865 nomadic culture, 54, 56, 613, 617, 618, 701, 860 nomenclature, 147
nomenklatura, 147
Non-Aligned Movement, 373
Non-Authoritarian Non-Democracy (see NAND) no-party regimes, 115, 296–297, 847
Nordlinger, Eric, 117
North Korea, 226, 343, 370, 509, 642, 735
  control, 364 cyber-warfare, 725
  drugs, 763
  famine, 746
  foreign policy, 201
  nuclear policy, 766
  party, 848
  secret police, 836
  soft power, 201
Nosavan, Phoumi, 67
nostalgia (authoritarian), 536
NPT, 765–766
nuclear policy, 765–766
Nujoma, Sam, 202, 203
Nye, Joseph, S. Jr., 198
Nyerere, Julius, 195, 423
Nzinga, Queen (Angola), 803

O

Obian, Teodoro, 103
Obote, Milton, 673
occupations (protest), 597
ochlocracy, 112
Octavian (Gaius Octavius), 344, 861
October Revolution (see Russian Revolution) O'Donnell Ure, Guillermo Alberto, 43–45, 86
  on Authoritarianism, 33
Okhrana, 833, 834, 836
oligarchization, 149, 574
oligarchs, 144, 149, 623
oligarchy, 148, 258, 299
  competitive, 288
  electoral, 299
  law of, 149, 574
oligopoly, 150
Olympic games, 198, 200, 774
Olympio, Sylvanus, 555
Oman, 125, 126
Ontological Security Theory, 685 open source intelligence, 839 operation/s Atalanta, 781
  Blue Star, 523
  bodyguard, 344
  Condor, 412, 640, 648, 761
  Enduring Freedom, 83
  Licorne, 84
  Noroît, 106
  Storm-333, 522
  Turquoise, 106
  by Wagner Group, 870 opposition, 884
  selectorate theory, 313
Oprichnina, 832, 836
Orange Revolution, 74, 646, 678
Orbán, Viktor, 197, 272, 325–326, 478, 513, 647, 808 constitution, 324
  party, 321
  repression, 756
ordo-liberalism, 748
organic statism, 33, 34
oriental despotism, 64, 65, 122 orientalist bias
  despotism, 65
  monarchy, 122
  Weber, 155, 208
ornamentalism, 585
Ortega, Daniel, 357, 641, 806, 875
Orwell, George, 46, 223, 623
OSINT, 839
Osman II (Ottomans), 862
Osman, Lassaad Ben, 188
Osnaz, 837, 863
ostracism, 353
Ottomans, 468, 697, 861–862
Otunbayeva, Roza, 805
ousters, 595
Owen, John IV, 394–395 (see also regime promotion; TINs)

P

pactology, 572
Pahlavi, Mohammad Reza, 629, 768, 797
Paine, Thomas, 29
Pakistan, 473–474, 519, 670, 879
  earthquake, 729
  warlords, 906
Palestine, 635, 636, 666, 784
Palestinian Liberation Organization (see PLO) Panama, 763
PAP, 331, 740, 744, 849
papal states, 218
paradox of plenty, 182
paramilitary, 824, 871
Pareto, Vilfredo, 573
Paris Commune, 71, 434
Park Chung-Hee, 520, 523, 743
Parks, Rosa, 886
parliamentary systems, 41, 185, 249, 278, 300, 423, 534, 585, 612
Parmehutu, 135
Parteidiktatur, 224
parties in authoritarian regimes, 847
  Islamist, 469–475

personalist, 372
(see also dominant parties; hegemonic parties; single-party regimes) pater familias, 64
patriarchalism, 152, 153, 231, 270, 802
patrimonial army, 207
Patrimonialism, 152
Patrimonium, 136, 152, 153, 154, 178, 179, 210, 617, 797
patrimonium populi, 154 patron, 57–58, 136, 159, 178, 365 patronage, 365
patronalism, 159, 612
patronal politics (see patronalism)
Paul III (Russia), 803
Pax Sinica, 129
Peel, Robert, 854
Pentecostals, 498
People's Action Party (see PAP)
People's Democratic Dictatorship, 72
People's Movement for the Liberation of Angola (see MPLA) People's Party (USA), 477
perestroika, 372, 402, 404
Pérez-Liñán, Aníbal, 283
Perlmutter, Amos, 117
on Authoritarianism, 31
on praetorianism, 863
Perón, Eva (Evita), 806
Perón, Isabel, 804, 806
Perón, Juan, 333, 804, 806 personalist rule, 162, 294, 297 (see also personalization) personality cults, 337, 343, 367, 690
personalization, 371–377
Pertinax, Publius Helvius, 861
Peru, 144, 850, 890
earthquake, 728
Peter I the Great (Russia), 41, 65, 155, 220, 863
Peter of Auvergne, 260, 261
pets, 800
Phalaris of Acragas, 240
Philippines, 144, 145, 324, 416, 421
corruption, 59
death squads, 873
(see also Duterte, Rodrigo; Marcos, Ferdinand) phthora, 213
pilfering, 61
pillars of authoritarian stability, 109
Pinochet, Augusto, 747, 855
piracy, 781
PiS, 321, 331, 848
Pisistratids of Athens, 240
Pittacus of Mytilene, 67
Planinc, Milka, 805
Plato
classification, 257–258
on aristocracy, 28
on despotism, 64
on regime change, 173–174
on timocracy, 219
on tyranny, 238, 525
Plekhanov, Georgy, V., 71
PLO, 783
Plutarch, Lucius Mestrius, 524 plutocracy, 149
PMC, 866
Poland, 321, 838, 848, 855
police, 824, 853
religious/morality, 853
politburo, 852
politeia, 148, 219, 237, 257–258, 503 political ideology (see ideology) political machines, 145 political opportunity structures, 410, 600 Political Regime Change (PRC) dataset, 282 political regimes, 173
classification, 245
Political Roles of the Military dataset, 118 political trust (see trust)
Polity Index, 27, 249, 301, 309–310
Pol Pot, 582
Polyarchy, 63, 85, 287, 287, 301, 303–304, 307
Index, 304, 317
Scale, 304
Polybius, 237, 258
pomest'e system, 209
Popper, Karl R., 222 populism, 477
vs. technocracy, 216
post-totalitarianism, 33, 224–225, 291, 298 potestas, 108, 165, 175, 176, 611 Poujadism, 479 power, 174, 254
colonial, 660
co-optative, 199 cyber-, 724
pyramids, 159
(see also hard power; sharp power; soft power)
Power Consolidation Index, 378–379 power-sharing (authoriarian), 188, 315, 410, 423, 425, 842
Prabhu, 127–128
Praetorians, 117, 860
prebendalism, 178
prebends, 154, 178, 207
precarium, 180
predatory state, 102
Preobrazhensky regiment, 803, 863
presidential guard, 860
systems, 185, 249, 278, 300, 416, 421, 422, 534, 563, 612, 687
PRI, 354, 416, 423, 534, 849
Prigozhin, Yevgeny V., 869–870 primogeniture, 614, 617–618, 801
primordialism, 465
prince (type of rule), 168 principal-agent model, 60, 163, 212–213, 826 (see also patron) Princip, Gavrilo, 523
principi naturali, 263
principi nuovi, 263
private military companies (see PMC) private security companies (see also PMC) Privilege Theory, 486
professionalization of armed forces, 44, 115, 534, 863
Pro-Government Militias Database (PGMD), 876 pronunciamiento, 550 proof of charisma, 50

propaganda, 381
  black, 344
property rights, 67, 149, 208, 241, 266, 568, 580, 610, 739, 741 prophet (type of rule), 168
protection pact, 67
Protestant Ethos, 269
Protestantism, 218
protests, 596
  mass, 597
  (see also Arab Spring; color revolutions) Przeworski, Adam (see also DD Index)
psychological profiles (of rulers), 810
Ptolemy of Lucca, 261 public choice theory, 204, 826 public services, 179, 184, 293, 473, 496
Pufendorf, Samuel von, 430
Puntland, 781, 782
purges, 335, 384–390
puritans, 218
Purple Revolution, 679
Putin, Vladimir V., 240, 338, 423, 641
  clan, 55
  inner circle, 692
  party, 850
  personalization, 342
  regime promotion, 652
  term limits, 356, 829–830
Putsch, 548, 550 (see also coup d'état) pyramids of power, 159, 160

Q

Qaboos bin Said al-Said (see Said (al-), Qaboos bin Said) Qaddafi (al-), Muammar, 629, 874
  body, 582
  books, 227–228, 375
  foreign policy, 418
  origins, 125
Qadi/Qazi (see Kadi justice)
Qatar, 126
Qin Shi Huang, 458
qishloqs, 55
queen mothers, 122, 133, 797, 802–806 queen regents, 620, 797, 802–806 queens, 122, 798, 801–804
Quran, 159, 468, 471, 500
quriltai, 51
Qusay, Saddam Hussein, 60, 862
Qutb, Sayid, 470, 471, 698–699

R

Rabin, Yitzhak, 522 racism, 484
  anti-Muslim, 490
  (see also antisemitism)
radio (see media)
Rahman, Ibrahim Helmi Abdel, 44
Rajah, 127, 130
Rājarṣi, 492
rallies, 597
rally-around-the-flag, 683, 695, 989
Rama X, 131
Rama IX, 131
rational choice theory, 41, 92, 293, 294, 315, 576–577, 579, 692
Ratsiraka, Didier, 356
Rawlings, Jerry, 399, 408, 529
Rawls, John, 110
Razak, Mohammad Najib bin Abdul, 806
Reagon, Ronald, 763 Realism (theory)
  neoclassical, 688
  on civil society, 882
  on power, 173, 176
  on regime promotions, 394
rebel governance, 889, 893
Rebel Quasi-State Institutions Dataset, 892 rebel regime, 117, 296, 888
  and resource curse, 185
Red Terror, 112, 522 regalia, 120
regents, 122, 133, 610, 615, 620, 802–806, 803–804 regicide, 524
regime
  challengers, 878
  change, 524, 569, 612, 626, 627, 629
  colonial, 658
  legitimation, 107
  no-party, 115, 296–297, 847 promotion, 391
  revolutionary, 607
  transitional, 87, 88, 213, 282, 288, 289, 296, 298, 311, 330, 563
Regime Cluster Theory, 397
Régiment de sécurité présidentielle (see RSP) regime promotion, 391 (see also democracy promotion) regimes (see political regimes) Regimes of the World (classification) (see RoW) regionalism, 712
  regime-boosting, 689, 714 shadow, 712 virtual, 712
RENAMO, 872 rent curse, 182
rentierism, 125, 183, 737
Rentier State Theory, 768–769 rents, 181
rent-seeking, 398
repertoires, 599
repression, 406
  preventive, 73
  and revolution, 605, 608
  transnational, 412, 594
Republicanism, 503 reputation laundering, 104 reserved domains, 85, 149 residents, 313
resilience (of regimes), 591
Resistência Nacional Moçambicana (see RENAMO) resource curse, 182
revolution, 601
  -ary legacies, 607
  (see also color revolutions)
Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (see FARC)
Rhee, Syngman, 67, 422
Rhodesia, 489 (see also Zimbabwe)
Ricardo, David, 402
Richter, Michael, 64 right-wing authoritarianism, 37,

38, 751, 756, 872, 874, 900, 903 riots, 597 rituals, 50
Romania
gender policy, 752
police, 854
secret police, 833, 834, 836
Rome, 112, 344, 861
clientelism, 58
dictatorship, 69
regime promotion, 394
Roosevelt, Eleanor, 301
Rosato, Sebastian (see also BMR Index)
Rosberg, Carl G., 163, 168
Rose Revolution, 54, 678
Rote Armee Fraktion, 783
Roth, Guenther (Günther), 137, 163, 207
Rouhani, Hassan, 218
Rousseau, Jean-Jacques, 154, 901
on republicanism, 504
on state of nature, 432, 433
on tyranny, 525
Rousseff, Dilma, 805
routinization of charisma, 50
RoW, 287
RSP, 865
rule of law, 254
and autocratization, 324, 325
and coups, 552
and democracy promotion, 669, 670 and democratic consolidation, 562, 564 and judiciaries, 623, 842 and legalism, 456 and legitimacy, 109
and minimalist democracy, 63, 274, 277, 307
Plato & Aristotle, 28, 258, 525 and republicanism, 504, 505
and totalitarianism, 623
Rule of Law Index, 98, 843
rulership, 32
co-, 133, 610, 802, 805–806 ruling coalition, 187
Russia, 347, 348, 417
censorship, 74, 76, 78, 705
Chechen War, 724
cyber-warfare, 725
development, 732
foreign policy, 641
gender policy, 755
indoctrination, 747
oligarchy, 149
paramilitary, 876
privatization, 144
regime promotion, 651
rentierism, 772
repression, 646
Russia-first-policy, 670
secret police, 834, 836, 863, 865
term limits, 423
Russian invasion of Afghanistan, 522, 907
of Ukraine, 338, 348, 642, 690–691, 692, 723, 772
Russian Orthodox Church, 41, 220, 638, 755
Russian Revolution, 601
Rwanda, 356, 736
gender policy, 753, 757
monarchy, 134

S

Sabah (al-) family (Kuwait), 126
Sadao Araki, 452
Sadat, Anwar, 523
Saddam Hussein Abd al-Majid al-Tikriti, 766 Baʿath, 472
body, 582
books, 375
family, 60, 799, 862
inner circle, 189
invasion of Kuwait, 692, 717, 718
paramilitary, 872
protection, 862
Saffron Revolution, 679
Said (al-), Qaboos bin Said, 126
Salafism, 470
Salazar, António de Oliveira, 33–34, 275
party, 195
secret police, 836, 838
Saleh, Ali Adbullah, 872
salic law, 617, 803
Salinas, Carlos, 849
Salisbury, John of, 525
Samburu, 157
sanctions, 412, 693
Sandinistas, 872 (see also Ortega, Daniel) Sankara, Thomas, 524, 528–530
Sankoh, Foday, 904
Sanogo, Amadou, 861
Saptanga Theory, 264–265
SARS, 734–735
Sartori, Giovanni
classification, 290
on dictatorship, 69–70
on parties, 850
on totalitarianism, 221, 223
Saud (al-), Faisal bin Abdulaziz, 523
Saud (al-), Faisal bin Musaid, 523
Saud (al-), Mohammed bin Salman bin Abdulaziz (MBS), 126 Saudi Arabia, 471
censorship, 78
ideology, 218
monarchy, 125
rentierism, 767
Schedler, Andreas, 86, 281, 284
classification, 249
Schmitter, Philippe, 86, 438
Schumpeter, Joseph, 250, 274, 304
on democracy, 62
Schutzstaffel (SS), 388, 813, 855, 862
SCO, 354, 641, 644, 713, 749, 898
secret police, 830
security gap, 779
security service, 831
segregation, 277, 448, 449, 454–455, 466, 487–489
Sékou Touré, Ahmed, 133, 528, 528, 530 selection bias, 342, 394, 564, 688, 770, 795 selectorate, 313
Selectorate Theory, 242, 313
self-censorship, 46 self-legitimation (see legitimation) Semenovsky regiment, 803, 836

semi-democracy/semidemocracy, 85–86, 87, 151, 281, 283, 299
semi-presidential, 249, 278, 300, 421, 687, 829
semi-regime actors, 866
Sendero Luminoso, 890
Seneca, Lucius Annaeus (the Younger), 524
Senegal, 202, 356, 510
Senghor, Léopold Sédar, 510
sequentialism, 741 serfs, 41, 180, 209
sexenio, 416
Shanghai Cooperation Organization (see SCO)
Shang Yang, 457
Shapiro, Leonard, 221
Sharon, Ariel, 111
sharp power, 190
Sheba (queen), 134
Sheikh Wazed, Hasina, 805
Shen Buhai, 458
Shen Dao, 458
Shen Pu-hai, 825
Shia, 473–474, 697
  in Bahrain, 126
Shinmin Autonomous Region, 434
Shinsawbu (Peru), 128
Shinto, 130, 451
Shirach, Baldur von, 878
Shoah, 229, 466
shogun, 130, 180
Shōwa regime, 130, 450
Shri, 127
Shtadlanut, 496
Shūmei Ōkawa, 452
Sierra Leone, 868, 872, 905
Sihanouk, Norodom, 67
Sikkim monarchy, 130
siloviki, 55, 149, 692
simple dictatorship, 70
Singapore, 233, 330, 331, 410, 740, 744, 757, 849
  censorship, 73
  development, 732
  model, 744
  party, 849
single-party regimes, 192, 294, 849
Sino-Soviet split, 401
Sirleaf Johnson, Ellen, 805
Sisi (el-), Abdel Fattah Saeed Hussein Khalil, 471, 533, 758 sistema, 99
sit-ins, 597
Siverson, Randolph M., 313
Skinner, Quentin, 255
Skocpol, Theda, 398, 602, 603 slavery, 224, 241, 241, 454, 486, 503, 504, 542, 543, 621, 657 abolition, 587
  sexual, 878 slave trade, 657
smart cities, 75
Smith, Adam, 585
Smith, Alastair, 313
Smyth, William Henry, 216
snitches, 417
Snyder, Timothy, 239
Sobhuza II (Eswatini), 135 social contract, 65, 433, 494, 525, 701, 767, 901
Social Democratic Party of Germany (see SPD) social engineering, 457, 460, 468, 609, 622, 813
socialism, 507
  African, 510
  Arab, 510
  with a human face, 508 social media, 46, 47, 72–74, 78, 112, 199, 341, 343–348, 369, 376, 382–383, 448, 470, 471, 596, 651, 679, 723, 879, 886, 887
Social movements, 885
Socrates
  classification, 257
  on aristocracy, 28
soft power, 198
  China, 200
  linkage & leverage theory, 114
  North Korea, 200
Sohm, Rudolph, 49–50
Solomon (king), 134
Solon (Athens), 219
Solzhenitsyn, Aleksandr I., 223
Somalia, 418, 781
  clans, 56, 781
  warlords, 904, 906
Somaliland, 661
Somoza regime, 103, 728, 875
Sonderweg, 638
sortition, 352
South Africa, 205, 280, 838, 851
  mercenaries, 868
South Korea, 67, 78, 422, 460, 522–523, 533, 734, 735, 740, 742–743
South-West African People's Organization (see SWAPO) sovereignty, 266, 676 absolute, 430 and colonial rule, 657
  cyber-, 724
  divided, 497
  divine, 496
  monarchic, 430
  and sanctions, 695
Soviet-Afghan War, 907
Soviet Union (see USSR)
Sozialdemokratische Partei Deutschlands (see SDP)
Spain, 542, 550, 573, 747, 838, 851, 855
Sparta, 222, 257
  gerontocracy, 157
  oligarchy, 148
SPD, 71, 574
Spearman, Diana, 41
spectacle politics, 733 specula principum, 263, 798 speech
  Nutuk (see Kemal, Ghazi Mustafa (Atatürk)) secret (see K, Nikita S.hrushchev) Spetsnaz, 836, 837
spoiling, 336
sports, 773–774
spymasters, 833
Srebrenica, 229
SS (see Schutzstaffel)
stability, 277, 591
  three pillars, 109, 333, 408
stagnation, 404
Stalin, Joseph V., 167, 372, 401
  body, 582
  charisma, 52
  cult, 370
  ideology, 508

on dictatorship, 71
party, 848
pets, 800
protection, 863
purges, 384
repression, 715
soft power, 199
Stasi, 407, 833, 834, 835, 836, 838
stasis, 67, 896
state capture, 204
State Capture Index, 205
state/states, 173
bifurcated, 659
colonial, 657
de facto, 666
failure, 776
halakhic, 497
Islamic, 697
narco-, 761
of nature, 432, 494, 495
police, 833, 858
rentier, 767
small, 377
unrecognized, 666
state terror (see terror)
Stepan, Alfred, 207, 291
Stevens, Siaka, 872
Straus, Leo, 238, 255
straw purchases, 708
streltsy, 863
strikes (protest), 597 strongman, 117, 163, 196
local, 138
Sturzo, Luigi, 222
Suarez, Francisco, 525 succession, 609–615
Sudan, 543
Mahdi uprisings, 699 suffrage, 273, 277, 279, 283, 287, 294, 317, 357, 358, 505, 569, 806 male, 251, 279–280, 299, 445 restricted, 278, 288, 299 Sufism, 53
Suharto, 834, 849
Sulla, Lucius Cornelius, 69
sultan, 127, 207 (see also monarchy) sultanism, 207
advanced, 211
(see also neo-sultanism) sultanization, 162–163, 169, 209, 360 Sunni, 125, 437–474, 500, 697 support (political), 108, 234 surveillance, 73 (see also intelligence services) Svolik, Milan, 315
classification, 249, 315
on personalist rule, 166
on power-sharing, 188
SWAPO, 203
Swaziland (see Eswatini)
Swiss guard, 862
sycophancy, 690
symphonia, 220, 497, 498
Syria, 335, 642, 676 drugs, 763 invasion, 684
paramilitary, 872
Systems Theory, 846

T

Tacitus, 394
Taishō, emperor Yoshihito, 450, 451
Taiwan, 357, 401
Tajikistan
rentierism, 771
warlords, 906, 907
Takfirism, 471
Taliban, 338, 474, 699, 890, 892, 907, 908 Talmon, Jakob, L., 222
Tamerlane (see Timur) Tamiyyah, ibn, 471
tandemocracy, 830
Tanganyika African National Union (see TANU) Tannenberg, Marcus on legitimization, 110–111
TANU, 133, 423
Tanzania, 423
Tatarstan, 144
Tatmadaw, 533
Taylor, Charles, 418, 629, 904, 905
child soldiers, 407
Taymiyyah, ibn, 501, 698, 701
technocracy, 44, 216
technopopulism, 482
teips, 98
telephone justice, 842
television (see media)
Tennōism, 130, 451
tenure, 167, 388, 580, 593, 613, 716, 718, 795 (see also longevity (of rulers)) Teorell, Jan, 296, 302 (see also H&T; V-Dem)
term limits, 356, 416
terror, 419–420
red, 112
by the state, 221, 406, 715
terrorism, 783
cyber-, 724, 725
terrorist groups, 896
Thailand, 277, 553, 560
monarchy, 128, 130–131
Thani (al-) family (Qatar), 126
theocracy, 217, 223, 296, 497, 783
theo-democracy, 698
Theodora (Byzantium), 805–806
theo-monarchy, 218
Theophrastus, 67
Theravada buddhism, 128
Thirty Years' War, 905
Thomas Aquinas, 260, 261, 262, 498, 525
Thucydides, 240
Tiananmen Square, 405, 744
Tiānmìng (see mandate of heaven)
tiānxià (see All-under-Heaven)
Tiberius, Claudius Nero, 240
Tibet, 129
Tiitinen, Seppo, 838
Tilly, Charles, 409, 567, 599–600, 603 time (and legitimacy), 111 time horizons, 580
timocracy, 219, 293
Timor-Leste, 128, 185
Timur (Tamerlane), 701
tinpots, 293
TINs, 114, 395, 783
Titoism, 509
Tito, Josip Broz, 373, 509, 805
Tocqueville, Alexis Charles Henri Clérel, comte de, 268, 881 on democratization, 566

on despotism, 65
on legitimacy, 108
Togo, 555
Tokayev, Kassym-Jomart, 626, 627 tol, 56
Tolstrup, Jakob, 83, 395
on linkage & leverage theory, 113
Tönnies, Ferdinand, 438
Tonton Macoutes, 875 torture, 411, 760
törü, 51
Totalitarianism, 221, 290
defective, 224
legacies, 622
quasi, 225 silent, 224
soft, 225
vs. Authoritarianism, 31–32, 69 totalitarians, 293
totalitarian syndrome, 223 traditional associates (see Genossen) traditional rule, 231, 270 transitional regime, 87, 88, 213, 282, 288, 289, 296, 298, 311, 330, 563 transition paradigm (see transitology) transitions, 624–630
transitology, 88, 252, 570
transnational ideological networks (TINs), 114, 395, 783 Treaty of Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons (see NPT) tribalism, 133
tribes, 701
Arab world, 124–125
and clans, 54
Tribhuvan Bir Bikram Shah Dev (Nepal), 130 troll armies, 73, 78, 723
Trotksy, Leon (Lev Davidovich Bronstein), 387, 508, 522, 603, 856
Trotskyism, 470, 507
Trujillo, Rafal, 59
Truman, Harry, 145, 462, 463 Trump, Donald J., 239, 878, 879
age, 157
assassination attempt, 526 campaign, 39 coup attempt, 339
disinformation, 346
elections, 333, 347, 356, 723
and far-right, 455
and oligarchy, 149
psychology, 819
trust (political), 108, 232
truth commissions, 583
Tsar, 41
Tschombe, Moise, 105, 528
Tsebelis, George, 242, 692 (see also veto players) Tuaregs, 861
tukhta, 691
Tulip Revolution, 678, 798
Tullock, Gordon, 254
Tunisia, 188
gender policy, 756, 757
monarchy, 125
Turabi (al-), Hasan, 699
Turchetti, Mario, 237, 238
on despotism, 64, 66
Turkey, 325, 356
censorship, 705
gender policy, 756
Turkmenistan, 369, 735
rentierism, 771
(see also Niyazov, Saparmurat (Türkmenbaşy)) Tushnet, Mark, 329
tutelary bodies, 121
Tutsi, 134–135, 551
Twitter Revolution, 679
tyrannicide, 264, 266, 524–525
and despotism, 64 tyranny, 237
elected, 64
vs. sultanism, 210
tyrant, 163, 168, 237, 293 (see also tyranny)

U

UAE, 418, 770
monarchy, 126
Uganda, 736
gender policy, 756
Ukraine, 241, 434, 588, 652, 653, 678, 679, 745
famine, 745-746
Russian influence, 641
secret police, 838
Ukrainian Insurgent Army (UPA), 87
Ulama, 218, 698
ultra-nationalism, 512 (see also nationalism)
Umar, Mulla Muhammad, 699
Umbrella for Democratic Change (UDC) (see 278) Umbrella Movement (see Hong Kong protests)
uncivil society, 900
unenfranchised, 314
Unified Democracy Scores (UDS), 302
United Arab Emirates (see UAE) United Russia Party, 850 uprisings (see protests)
urban planning, 775
colonial, 453, 587
Uruguay, 533
USA
foreign policy
Bahrain, 43
invasion
of Afghanistan, 892
of Dominican Republic, 684 of Iraq, 651, 717, 766, 812 (see also by president)
USSR, 147, 800, 848, 852, 854, 855, 873
censorship, 705
foreign policy, 394
gender policy, 752
militsia, 855
nuclear policy, 765
propaganda, 417
repression, 715
youth movements, 877
(see also Lenin, Vladimir I.; Stalin, Joseph V.) Uyghurs, 75, 490, 749, 758
Uzbekistan, 680
corruption, 59
gatekeeping, 83

V vaccine diplomacy, 200

van de Walle, Nicholas, 138
Vanhanen Index, 299, 307–308
Vanhanen, Tatu, 307
Vargas Llosa, Mario, 519
Varieties of Democracy (see V-Dem)
Varieties of Political Regimes, 298
V-Dem, 287, 316–318
Velvet Revolutions, 678
Venezuela, 330, 333, 534, 733
  censorship, 78
  rentierism, 771
Venice, 157, 158, 268
Versailles, 106, 336 treaty of, 466
Versailling, 336
veto players, 692
Victoria, Queen (UK), 128, 130
Vienna Declaration, 669 Vietnam, 67, 75, 169, 196, 745, 845
  monarchy, 128
Vietnam War, 175, 439
vigilantism, 101, 112
Voltaire (François-Marie Arouet)
  on despotism, 65
von Soest, Christian
  legitimization, 109, 110
Vreeland, James Raymond (see also DD Index)

W

Wade, Abdoulaye, 202, 356
Wagner Group, 709, 869
Wahhab (al-), Muhammad ibn Abd, 471
Wahhabism, 125, 470–471
Wahman, Michael, 29 (see also H&T)
Wai, Zubairu, 139
Wanké, Daouda, Mallam, 863
warlords, 904
Warnig, Matthias, 833
War on Terror, 83
waves of democracy & autocracy, 671
Way, Lucan, 86, 281, 285, 395 (see also L&W) Weber, Max
  classification, 268
  on bureaucracy, 825
  on legitimacy, 108
  (see also charismatic rule; Kadi justice; patrimonialism; sultanism; traditional rule)
Weeks, Jessica, 409, 717
Westphalian myth, 265
Weyland, Kurt, 395
whataboutism, 47
whistleblowers, 417, 735
White Revolution, 768
white supremacy, 454, 486, 489
Wilkie, Wendell, 301
William III of Orange, 806
William of Moerbeke, 260, 261
Wilson, Woodrow, 883 winning coalition, 242, 313
  and personalization, 378
  (see also Selectorate Theory)
Wintrobe, Ronald, 219, 293
Wittfogel, Karl August, 65
Wolf, Markus, 833
Wollstonecraft, Mary, 752 women
  and clans, 54
  in regimes, 801
Worker's Party of Korea (WPK), 848
Wright, Joseph, 294
  on personalist rule, 163
  (see also GWF)
Wu Zetian, 803
WZB-model, 333
xeer, 56

X

Xenophon, 64
Xi Jinping, 200, 375, 416, 638, 843
  books, 228
  inner circle, 692
  term limits, 416
Xinjiang, 75, 749
Xunzi, 456, 458, 495

Y

Yagoda, Gerikh G., 863
Yanukovich, Viktor F., 641, 653
yasa, 51
Yellow Emperor, 129
Yeltsin, Boris N., 55
Yemen, 470, 872
  monarchy, 126
Yezhov, Nikolai I., 384, 833, 863
Yoshihito (see Taishō) youth bulge, 784
  movement, 877
  rights, 788
  unemployment, 784–785
Yugoslavia, 373, 440, 508, 509
Yushchenko, Viktor A., 653

Z

zaibatsu, 452
Zaire (see Congo (Kingshasa))
Zambia, 82, 543, 850
Zamyatin, Yevgeny, 223
Zapatistas, 435
ZAPU, 202, 203
Zasags, 129
Zayed, Mohammed bin (see Nahyan (al-), Mohammed bin Zayed)
Zelenskyy, Volodymyr, 241, 522
Zeno of Citium, 432
Zersetsung, 407
Ziaul-Haq, Muhammad (Pakistan), 519
Zida, Yacouba Isaac, 865
Zimbabwe, 202, 357, 489, 582, 756, 806 and North Korea, 202
Zimbabwe African People's Union (see ZAPU)
Zinoviev, Grigory Y., 387
Zionism, 497, 513
Žižek, Slavoj, 95
Zolberg, Aristide, 137, 163
Zuma, Jacob, 205

ABOUT THE M.O.R.D.O.R. PROJECT

1000 Manat, Turkmenistan (2005), depicting Saparmurat Niyazov, founding president and former first secretary of the Turkmen Communist Party.

M.O.R.D.O.R. existed as an international consortium of higher education institutions and think tanks between 2021 and 2024 with associated partners on all continents. As an Erasmus+ project co-funded by the EU, we have embarked on a mission to illustrate the importance of collaboration between the fields of Area Studies, Political Science, and Policy Analysts and prove their practical (combined) benefits for improving education and policy recommendations.

M.O.R.D.O.R stands for Mapping & Organizing Research on Dictatorships – Open Access Repository and plans to integrate current knowledge on democracy support and comparative authoritarianism, organize this knowledge and channel new insights into two main outputs:

The first main project output is this Encyclopedia Tyrannica – a compendium of relevant research presenting a full review of the existing literature on comparative authoritarianism from the last five decades, but supplemented with a pedagogic and methodological dimension so that this work can be used by educators, students and scholars alike to foster change and innovation in how these groups teach, learn and engage in research.

The didactic companion 'Navigating Dictatorship and Democratization in the Classroom' can be downloaded on the right.

Didactic Companion

The second main project output is a Policy Paper on EU Democracy Support, which is tailored for EU foreign policy specialists and practitioners. These recommendations for stakeholders present a long-needed new approach, assessing the multi-vector EU democratization policy from the point of view of EU priorities, norms, capabilities and interests, and well as from the perspective of authoritarian contexts. The policy paper reevaluates the EU position and roles amid a fluid international system, currently challenged by a new wave of authoritarianism.

The policy paper, titled: 'Harnessing the democratising potential of the EU's foreign policy agenda' is available on the right.

Policy Paper on EU Democracy Support

In addition, the M.O.R.D.O.R. project organized various events related for students (Master Classes) and several conferences and seminars for scholars, researchers and stakeholders. All details and outputs can be found in open access format on the official EU project platform and project website: www.mordorproject.eu

M.O.R.D.O.R. project

MAPPING and ORGANIZING RESEARCH on DICTATORSHIPS OPEN ACCESS REPOSITORY

Co-funded by the European Union

The M.O.R.D.O.R. consortium comprised the following partner institutions:

Consortium Partners

Adam Mickiewicz University, Poznań (coordinating institution)

European Partnership for Democracy (EPD)

German Institute of Development and Sustainability (IDOS)

Ljubljana State University

Ostravská Univerzita

Universidade de Coimbra

Universita di Catania

Universiteit Gent

University of Essex

Univerzita Karlova

Associated Partners

Asian NGO Coalition for Agrarian Reform and Rural Development (Manila)

British Teaching University (Tbilisi, Georgia)

De La Salle University (Manila)

Institut français d'études sûr Asie centrale (IFEAC – Bishkek)

North West University (Potchefstroom, South Africa)

Pontificia Universidad Catolica Argentina (Buenos Aires)

Universidad de San Andrés (Buenos Aires)

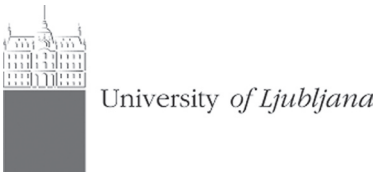
University of Malaya (Kuala Lumpur)

University of Nigeria (Nsukka)

University of Pretoria

University of the Philippines (Manila)

Zayed University (Abu Dhabi, UEA)



UAM
Adam Mickiewicz University in Poznań

University of Essex

European Partnership for Democracy

UNIVERSITY OF OSTRAVA

UNIVERSITEIT
GENT

University of Ljubljana

CHARLES UNIVERSITY

SICILIAE STVDIVM GENERALE
1434 UNIVERSITÀ degli STUDI di CATANIA

IDOS
German Institute of Development and Sustainability

· U C ·
Universidade de Coimbra

"This Encyclopedia is the outcome of an ambitious and massive endeavour. The entries offer not only conceptual clarity and theoretical discussion, but also information on measurement and methodological implications. Such approach represents a great innovation making this work a comprehensive and valuable source of information for anyone interested in autocratic politics."

Abel Escribà-Folch, Associate Professor of Political Science, Universitat Pompeu Fabra (Catalunya)

"For too long, the study of autocracies has existed in multiple subject bubbles with limited cross-referencing between each. This has meant that the study of autocracies has largely developed in silos. The Encyclopedia Tyrannica provides detailed analysis of the extent of authoritarian studies, bringing together entries from across disciplines to offer a light to a wide – and often confusing – subject. The encyclopedia will provide academics, students and policymakers with a clearer understanding of how these regimes operate, survive and in some cases flourish. The volume is essential reading for those interested in authoritarian regimes or specific topics pertaining to autocracies."

Stephen Hall, Assistant Professor in Russian and Post-Soviet Politics, University of Bath

ENCYCLOPEDIA TYRANNICA

The Encyclopedia Tyrannica transcends the conventional boundaries of an encyclopedia, serving as a comprehensive research guide for scholars, students, and experts in the fields of authoritarianism and democratization. It delves deep into the historical, theoretical, and methodological underpinnings of key concepts while providing exhaustive literature reviews and exploring their varied applications across different world regions. Recognizing the challenges posed by the expanding landscape of authoritarian studies, over thirty experts collaborated to navigate the vast literature, mapping blind spots and accounting for nuances.

Whether seeking foundational knowledge or navigating specialized topics, the 'Tyrannica' stands as the definitive resource in dictatorship studies. By bridging gaps between theory and practice, novice and expert, it aims to foster a deeper understanding of autocratic regimes, their classifications, features, actors, behavior, worldviews and transitions.

Designed with a structured approach, the 'Tyrannica' organizes entries logically, offering both alphabetical and thematic arrangements in eight sections. Additional information boxes enhance understanding by providing context-specific examples and understudied aspects. Intended as the quintessential reference for scholars and students alike, this encyclopedia extends beyond academia to policymakers and experts, offering a systemic overview of dictatorship studies and its intersections with democratization research. Area study experts will find alternative theories and regional variations elucidated, while educators can utilize the book as a teaching aid.

This book was co-funded by the Erasmus+ programme of the European Union within the M.O.R.D.O.R. project (2021-1-PL01-KA220-HED-000023034).

MAPPING and ORGANIZING RESEARCH on DICTATORSHIPS
OPEN ACCESS REPOSITORY

Adam Mickiewicz University in Poznań

University of Essex

ISBN: 978-3-8382-1882-3

Distributed by Columbia University Press

Co-funded by the Erasmus+ Programme of the European Union ibidem